Multiflora Rose

Pest To Be Eliminated

Members of the Beef Cattle Commission of the Western North Carolina Development Association have launched an attack aimed at eliminating the existence of the multiflora rose.

In a resolution adopted during a recent meeting, the commission accuses the rose of being a severe pest and removing thousands of acres of Western North Carolina land from production, resulting in a major economic loss to the area. Control of the rose, according to the resolution, has placed an economic burden upon farmers and livestock producers. The "widespread distribution of this pest plant in future years will pose a severe threat to the area's livestock industry and be detrimental to good usage of the area's land resources," the resolution states.

The multiflora rose was introduced throughout Western North Carolina as a wildlife habitat, natural fencing and conservation plant. It can be seen along roadsides throughout the area. When introduced, indiscriminate spreading of the plant was not foreseen. However, it has been shown that birds and other wildlife, after eating the fruit of the plant, spread the seeds far and wide to various locations. Pastures and hill-sides are becoming covered in many localities. Removal of the plant is difficult and costly.

Hal Weir of Asheville, commission chairman, stated the plant can be controlled and eliminated by chemicals. Weir said this has been amply demonstrated on test plots in Western North Carolina by the N.C. Agricultural Extension Service and scientists of N.C.S.U. However, chemical eradication is extremely costly to the landowner, especially when the same land may become reinfested with multiflora roses existing along highways and in neighboring fields.

The commission's petition, which was sent to various local, state and national governmental agencies, urges permanent stoppage of the planting of the multiflora rose along highway rights-of-way and the eradication of existing plants by the N.C. Department of Transportation. Additionally the resolution calls for a joint study and broadscale eradication program of the plant by the N.C. Department of Agriculture, the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture and the North Carolina State University.

Rx dollars still bargain

Difficult to swallow, but it's true. Prescription drugs remain one of the most reasonably priced things you can buy — even as just about everything else in the nation continues to sky rocket in price.

While medical costs as a whole have risen nearly 100% in the past ten years, prescription drugs increased only 17%. All consumer items shot up 70% over the same period.

Few professionals in America have been as nice to your wallets and pocketbooks as we have. As your Pharmacist, I just thought you'd like to know!
