training procedures for school

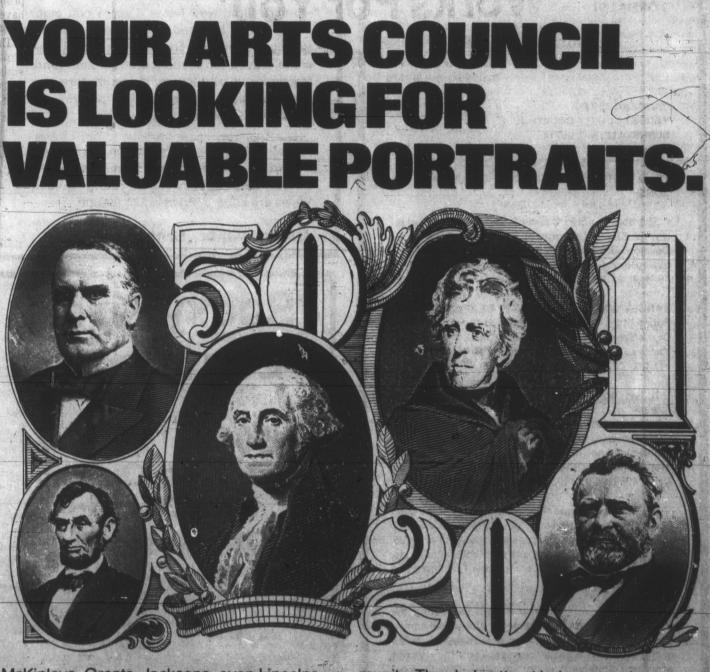

State Secretary of Transportation Tom Bradshaw urged the drivers education representatives, who conduct driver improvement clinics and teach defensive driving courses as well as train school bus drivers, to be prepared to implement the new procedures as soon as the equipment is installed on the vehicles. He also praised the "spirit of cooperation" between the motor vehicles. division and education officials throughout the state.

"And I know each of you will continue your outstanding efforts in training safe and competent drivers for the largest school bus fleet in the nation," Bradshaw told the group.

Elbert L. Peters, Jr., Commissioner of Motor Vehicles, said the agency "is working closely with education officials to implement use of these new safety devices to achieve our mutual goal of transporting pupils safely to and from school." Peters noted that the driver McKinleys, Grants, Jacksons, even Lincolns and Washingtons. To your local arts council, they're all "valuable portraits".

You see, insufficient funding is a fact of life for all the arts. Business contributions and government grants cover only a small portion of an arts council's financial needs: And ticket sales to concerts and plays don't begin to cover the actual costs involved.

That's where you come in.

When you contribute to the arts, you're making an investment that will pay you back for years and years to come. How so? Because the arts do quite a lot for you and your community. They help attract industry, and create jobs. They boost tourism and recreation. They bring artists, musicians and dancers to your public schools. They make life a little more enjoyable, a little more meaningful.

So, give generously to your local arts fund. Donate a few Jacksons or Lincolns, or sign your John Hancock on a check. It's all tax deductible. And it's all very, very valuable.
