Critics Praise Folk Album Recorded By Murphy Lass

By Louise Bayless

MURPHY - Hedy West, singing songs passed down by generations of mountain folk, is acclaimed nationally and internationally by critics and music lovers.

Hedy West's great-grandmother was born in Blairsville, Union County, Georgia, about fifteen miles from Murphy, back when it was little more than a wagonroad crossing of muddy ruts.

Her grandmother now lives on Lower Young Cane, in the Noda Dam area.

Both of these ancestors, and others who came from Western North Carolina and Gilmer County, Georgia at Ellijay, were singers of the old songs.

They sang, as mountainfolk still do, for pleasure, or because they are lonesome, or to ease a hurt.

Sometimes it may be for entertainment of family, friends, or neighbors. In any event they were, and are, songs of beauty that carry inspirational melodies.

Our mountain fiddlers, fiddlers and banjo pickers still have appreciative local audiences even if limited in numbers.

This is verified each year at the Georgia Mountain Fair at Hiwassee, but now and then an authentic mountain folk singer breaks loose and carries the old songs to wide audiences far beyond our hills.

Hedy West is one. She is a 1955 graduate of Murphy High School, valedictorian of her class, and attended Western Carolina College. After getting her degree she went on to attend Columbia University, New York. Her mother, Mrs. Constance West, was on the faculty of the Murphy City Schools for several years.

In an album recently published by the Vanguard Recording Society of New York, Hedy gives a varied sampling of the beauty to be found in genuine folk songs.

Nearly all of her selections in this album are from Western North Carolina and North Georgia.

She learned them from her grandmother, her Uncle Gus Mulkey at Jasper, from old folks around Ellijay, from Tom Fortenberry of Owitown in Union County and other mountain singers.

No place in this country affords a richer source of authentic folk songs than the Appalachian Mountain South. And no part of this area has better materials than the Western Carolina mountains.

It is to this source that Hedy West has gone for both her songs and inspiration.

Accompanying herself in a superbly accomplished style on the five-string banjo, she renders the old songs in the spirit and tone your grandparents may have sung or listened to.

A highly trained professional musician, Hedy goes to the root source for her songs; and she breathes a fresh breath of living into these old songs, giving them genuine meaning and wide appeal. Her singing has aroused nationwide and enthusiastic critic and audience response.

Thus Hedy West takes the feeling thoughts of our old folk songs to wider and greater audiences.

One radio station in Western Australia gave a full hour program to playing her songs.

For several months Hedy has been singing in California. She has now returned to New York via Sun Valley, Idaho, and other centers, where she will make another Vanguard record and sing in eastern cities for a while.

She is an accomplished flutist, pianist, and orchestrator. She also composes music and has recently finished the musical arrangements for a book of folk songs for the noted authority and collector, Alan Lomax.

She has also just about completed a book of her own, dealing with the folk lore and folk song background of Western North Carolina and North Georgia.

A young lady in her early twenties, Hedy is a serious student of her subject.

In a recent review of her current album, the Denver (Colorado) Post music critic wrote:

"A treasure for the collectors of the authentic style is the latest recording from Vanguard, 'Hedy West'. This young lady came from a long line of folk singers and sings in the style of the mountain people who preserved the songs they brought with them from England."

"Hedy West accompanies herself on the five-string banjo in a program of considerable variety. . . 'Miss West is an extremely talented young lady and if you are among those who value authentic, folk style material, this recording should be very pleasing.'"

Another critic response, typical of others, came from the critic of the Gazette-Mail (Charleston, W. Va.), who wrote under the heading "Real Folk Music":

"An Appalachian girl from North Georgia and Western

North Carolina has absorbed enough of the outside world to become a professional musician. At the same time she has genuine roots among the folks.

"That combination makes for superior folk music. . . Her family was among the early settlers of the Appalachians and she is heir to an oral folk tradition passed from generation to generation."

"Besides that she has a splendid voice with which to sing folk songs. The result is that her record is delightful and without the dishonest pretensions of much contemporary folk music."

About a poem the late Robert Frost wrote: "It begins in delight and ends in wisdom." Poet Frost also wrote: "No tears in the writer, no tears in the reader." This applies as well to music and song.
