could result in a reduction in the burley tobacco allotment next established for the farm.

ATTENTION WOOLGROWERS: The 1963 wool marketing year ends December 31, 1963. In order to be eligible for incentive payment on 1963 marketing, growers must file application in ASCS office not later than January 31, 1964.

Tobacco growers are reminded that marketing cards must be returned to the ASCS office as soon as all tobacco from the farm is marketed. Failure to return this card

Cattle Equipment Plans Available

By James M. Stewart
County Extension Chairman

Every livestock producer at some time has to be able to catch and hold his animals. He has to be able to provide a good place to feed and house his animals.

There are many plans available for all producers who wish to have better livestock facilities.

The County Extension Office has publications which will give workable plans for equipment and buildings needed by livestock producers. One of these publications is made up by several universities and published by the Midwest Plan Service.

This complete beef cattle plan book can be obtained from the County Agent's office at the cost of one dollar.

Another publication by the USDA gives some practical ideas on equipment for beef cattle. This publication is available free.

The North Carolina Extension Service has building plans for various types of livestock equipment including: holding chutes, corrals, and feeding barns.

Livestock farmers needing plans to do a specific job can look at the building plans available in County Extension office and order the plans needed free of charge.

Cherokee County farmers might well take a look at their present feed supply to find out if they will have sufficient feed to carry them through the winter.

Total digestible nutrients in corn is much higher than in hay and on the basis of nutrients in corn producers can pay better than $1.50 per bushel and still make a saving over the farmer who purchases $30 to $40 ton of hay.

WALTER BRYSON OF MARBLE bagged this buck with an unusual rack of nine points on Panther Top Monday morning about 8:30.

Woodland Pastures Not A Profitable Practice

Pasturing of 13,400 acres or 15.8% of Cherokee County's farm woodlands are causing farmers to lose a great deal of money in more ways than one.

Using mountain farm woodland in this area for pasture will damage soil, destroy young tree seedlings, and lower growth rates of timber. Furthermore, cattle on woodland pasture gain weight slowly or may even lose weight.

Studies were conducted in Western North Carolina where six yearlings were allowed to graze 145 acres of woodland from May to September for a period of six years.

By the end of the first grazing season, practically all the forage and most of the hardwood understory had been destroyed.

During the third year each animal lost one and one-half pounds per day, and forage became so scarce that the cattle required 60 bushels of corn and 1,500 pounds of cotton seed meal each season in order to have enough strength to range the area.

After the six years of continuous trampling, the compacted soil caused water runoff to increase 90%. Soil loss increased from nearly nothing to 528 pounds per acre per year, and the woods took on a park-like appearance, causing the hot sun and dry winds to bake and dry the soil, creating conditions unfavorable to natural restocking.

Seedlings that do come in are quickly eaten or trampled.

Planting trees, shrubs, and evergreens before the ground freezes will provide a head start with next year's landscaping.

Dig the hole large enough. Don't stuff a plant into too small a hole. Make it large enough to accommodate bare root stock without cramping the roots. With balled and burlapped material, allow an extra six inches beyond the wrapping.

When filling the hole, firm it well to work out all air pockets. Leave a basin so that water will run to the plant instead of away from it. Then water the plant well. Turning the faucet pressure down allows most of the water to soak into the root area.

After filling the hole and watering thoroughly, prune the plant, whether it is a tree, shrub, or evergreen. Balled and burlapped material doesn't need such severe pruning as bare root stock. Pruning about half of the tops compensates for root loss during transplanting.

It is important to cut back branches equally to retain the same shape as before pruning. But, cut just the side branches. Cutting back the main branch or leader causes undesirable forking later.

Planting Trees, Shrubs Before Hard Freeze Provides Head Start For Coming Year

After pruning, wrap the tree up to the first side branches with commercial tree-wrapping paper. This prevents sun scald, which in turn invites borers and other damaging insects. Sun scald is a real winter problem with newly transplanted trees.

Then stake the tree to prevent wind whipping. Roots break away from the soil if the wind whips the trees excessively. For added insurance, give the tree or shrub a good drink of water before the hard freeze so that it will have plenty of moisture.
