Automatic Laundry Equipment Washes, Dries New Fabrics

Manufacturers of automatic laundry appliances have taken full account of your wishes and needs for equipment that will take care of all kinds of washes. Their automatic washers and dryers have better controls and greater flexibility, making it easy to launder all fabrics - including the man-made kind.

Many of the new washers give you gentle as well as vigorous agitation speeds for the wash cycle. The wash action may be set for a shorter time than normal, and wash water may be cold or cool. Dryers offer a wide range of temperatures and times for the drying cycle, and some finish off with a cooling period.

Such controls as these are important if you're to do a good job of laundering certain man-made fibers and some of the new finishes. These fabrics must be handled properly in both the washer and dryer if you are to get best results.

Synthetics made of "thermoplastic" fibers have a "plastic memory", making them seek to return to their original shape. Heat makes them wander from this shape; coolness eases them back.

In washing some fabrics of these fibers, water temperature should be cool or cold, agitation gentle, and the spin cycle slower and shorter than for normal washes. Such fabrics should be dried for a short time on a low heat and taken from the dryer the minute the basket stops tumbling - or even before to prevent rumpling by other clothes settling down on top of them.

Creases such as pleats are put in by clothing manufacturers at a much higher heat than your dryer produces. The fibers remember this, and tend to return to their original state in your dryer.

Having many of the properties of synthetics, cottons treated with resins are moisture resistant and wrinkle resistant. They can be placed about halfway between synthetics and untreated cottons in considering temperatures of wash and rinse water and dryer temperatures.

In using bleaches with treated cottons, it's best to follow tag directions. Some may be bleached with chlorine bleach; others may not.

The chief thing to remember in laundering new fabrics and finishes is that your washing method is as important as drying. Many a dryer has been unjustly blamed for poor results caused by improper washing. With the right methods for both washing and drying - and new automatic laundry equipment gives you controls for these methods - care of the new fabrics is easy.
