Disease Threat Constant For Livestock Producer

The threat of a disease epidemic hovers over the livestock farmer like a dark cloud. It never goes away. Cattlemen remember the black days of cattle fever that ravaged the southeast 40 years ago. And just 20 or 30 years ago there were sections of the country where hogs couldn't be grown because of cholera. Hogmen, including those in North Carolina, dread the thought of cholera even more than low pork prices. Whole herds numbering in the hundreds have been completely wiped out by the disease in the not too distant past.

What these farmers may not be aware of, however, is that there is a disease of hogs even more dreadful than cholera—African swine fever. Fortunately, it hasn't yet reached the shores of the United States. And every effort is being made, by the U. S. Department of Agriculture and the Livestock industry, to see that it never arrives.

Dr. F. J. Mulhern, deputy administrator of USDA's Agricultural Research Service, in a speech to hog producers in Raleigh recently discussed the threat of African swine fever and other foreign diseases to U.S. livestock.

"Some may say nothing could be worse than cholera," Dr. Mulhern said, "but we are told that African swine fever kills hogs quicker and spreads more rapidly and there is not an effective vaccine for it."

He explained that the disease spread from African to Portugal and Spain and then to Italy just a few years ago. Until that time it appeared to be contained within Africa.

"We are told that the swine industries in those countries have not recovered from that experience," Dr. Mulhern said. Another disease that is a constant threat throughout the entire world is foot-and-mouth disease. The last case in this country was in 1929. Then, it's entrance into the country was traced to feeding ships' garbage to hogs.

"Most occurrences of this disease in countries that were free usually were found first in swine that had eaten animal meat scraps or by-products that originated in countries

Rep Roy A. Taylor Proposes Tobacco Allotment Transfers

Washington-U.S. Rep. Roy A. Taylor Monday introduced a bill which would authorize the lease and transfer of burley tobacco allotments from farm to farm.

The 11th District Congressman said his action was prompted largely by figures showing that Western North Carolina burley growers are now losing more than $1 million annually in potential income through failure to use allotted acres.

Chiefly responsible is the fact that burley allotments are so small that it is often uneconomical or impractical for the allotment holder to grow tobacco. Authority to lease and transfer tobacco allotments from farm to farm would mean additional income to both the grower and the original allotment holder. Under Taylor's bill, farmers could lease their allotments to other growers in the same counties for a period not to exceed five years.

The legislation has the backing of the Asheville Agricultural Development Council, local ASCS organizations and other farm groups throughout the area, Taylor said.

The bill will be referred to the House Agriculture Committee for hearings. Taylor said he would push for action at an early date. Taylor supported similar legislation last year and it was approved by the House Agriculture Committee, but did not secure approval of Congress.
