Review of Past Week's News

One of the longest sessions in recent months was held last week by the Kinston board of aldermen when Leigh Wilson, representative of the North Carolina League of Municipalities, presented his recommendations for the extension of the city limits of Kinston. Wilson suggested that three areas should be taken in, and in this order: First the area bounded on the east by the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad right of way, extending northward to include the built-up areas on the old Snow Hill highway, across the present Snow Hill highway and across to Heritage Street extended. The second area would include several acres of the Perry Estate property lying east of the Country Club and north of the present city limits. The third area would include the area now lying between Kinston and the Caswell Training School.

Carroll S. Anderson, a native of Baltimore, has been named general superintendent of construction on the new Du Pont Dacron plant that is to be built in Lenoir County's Contentnea Neck Township. Anderson was superintendent for the huge Delaware company on construction of the world's first nylon plant at Seaford, Del., and has had a major part in the $550,000,000 construction program of the company since the end of World War II. Anderson and his family will live in Kinston in the home of Dixie Moore on North Queen Street.

Over the weekend the search for two men who are wanted for assault with a deadly weapon and attempted rape switched to Camp Lejeune. These charges grew from a late Friday night attack upon a Camp Lejeune Marine who was knocked unconscious by a blow on the head with a heavy limb and whose girlfriend was dragged several hundred feet by the assailant before a "buddy" of the assaulted Marine could frighten the would-be rapist into dropping the girl and fleeing into the woods near Southwest Creek Christian Church where the crime took place. The two Marines had been approached earlier in the evening by a man at a South Queen Street service station who wanted to sell them some whisky. The Marines say it was this same would-be whisky peddler who committed the attack at Southwest Creek. A witness has told police that the whisky peddling assaulter of the Marine and his girl friend was riding in a car that had a Camp Lejeune license tag on it.

Kinston and Lenoir County authorities were faced with a frustrating situation over the weekend. Citizens of the Hugo community came in to swear out a warrant for C. J. Morris of Craven County, who had, according to these affiants, brutally beaten and stomped his three year old step child because the child had stepped into a mud hole and messed up his new Easter shoes. The frustration arose when the warrant was sent to a Craven County constable for service since the alleged child-stomper had returned to his home near Dover. The Craven County officer refused to serve the warrant on the grounds that the seal was not stamped on it. Local officers say the seal was on the warrant. At any rate late Tuesday afternoon the man charged with such an inexcusably brutal crime was still not under arrest.

Minstrel Thursday

Students of Maysville-Pollockville High School under the direction of Mrs. Dalton Cox are presenting a minstrel, "The Lazy Moon," at 7:30 Thursday night (March 29) in the school auditorium. A small admission fee will be charged to this presentation and all profits from the affair will go into the school's lunch room fund and to the Community Recreation Center now under construction in Pollockville. The public is promised a hilarious evening's entertainment for the small cost of seeing this minstrel.

No Agent Named

In a special meeting last Wednesday night some little discussion was had by the Jones County Board of Commissioners on the naming of a new County Agent to replace A. V. Thomas whose resignation becomes effective April 1st. District County Agent C. S. Mintz was present with the board at this meeting and offered a number of names for the post but no final action was taken at the Wednesday night session. It is understood that the commissioners are seeking a farm agent whose specialty is field crops with particular knowledge of tobacco production. Final action on this vacancy is expected to be taken at the Monday meeting of the commissioners when they convene in regular April session.

Sheriff At Watts

Jones County Sheriff Jeter Taylor underwent a major operation Tuesday at Watt Hospital in Durham. He has been under treatment for some time for the kidney ailment which has now required surgery. At press time his condition following the operation was not known but attending physicians felt that Taylor's general physical condition was strong enough to take this major operation without any grave dangers. He is expected to be home from the hospital around the latter part of next week and possibly sooner.
