

Why Women Bore Each Other? Written By Reckless Male

by Billy Arthur

Why do women bore each other? Under a seal of inviolate confidence, I've put the question to a number of women acquaintances recently, because I had often heard some of them remark at another female at one time or another, "She bores me."

Why? Put together, the separate answers resemble a press interview.

"We find our sex uninteresting," said a fluffy teacher.

"I find myself very interesting, thank you," remarked a nursing student.

"To yourself, perhaps," added a newspaper reporter. "We're all interesting to ourselves. That's what makes women natural born bores. But the idea is not to become a classified bore."

"There is only one type of girl who's not a bore," added a waitress. "That's the quiet, repressed type. The girl who always seems to be holding something back, who doesn't talk too much. We all talk too much and that is one reason we bore each other. But the repressed girl says little and when you try to draw her out she only opens her eyes wide and looks at you intelligently. But she never tires you."

"I hate that kind," said the newspaper girl. "They make one too conscious of their superiority. They're as big a bores as clever women."

"I never knew a clever woman who wasn't stupid," said the nursing student.

"Women who are always telling funny stories bore me," the teacher broke in.

"And those who can't see through a joke!" exclaimed the newspaper girl. "Aren't they impossible? And the ones who laugh at the wrong place or before the story is finished?"

"I think enthusiastic girls are the worst," suggested the waitress. "They are always rapturous about something that seems ordinary to others. When you're blasé on a subject yourself, it seems vulgar that others enthused over it."

"But it's different when it's your own fad," suggested the newspaper girl.

"All faddy girls are bores," asserted the student, "whether it's men or clothes."

"One of the funniest bores," mused the teacher, "is the unattractive woman who goes about telling people of her conquests. Men are always pursuing her and falling in love and proposing to her at the rate of one a day. She creates them imaginatively in the absence of the real article."

"Have you ever met an aggressively happy person?" asked the nursing student. "The kind that is always so offensively healthy, and talks of cold baths so much that you begin to think she actually takes them. Or steam baths, and says there's no trouble that can't be steamed out of you. And how many miles a day she walks. She's on such good terms with herself that you hate her. A girl who is always contented like that is a dreadful bore."

"But they're not as bad as miserable people," said the newspaper girl. "They always have some horrors to talk about, suicides, accidents, misfortunes, crimes. Sometimes they pose as being generously sympathetic and charitable, and that is why they tell you of all the misery they see or hear about. Their personal illness, woes, and bereavements are so many that you always expect to hear another, and it actually seems like a part of the program. They're always laid a relative. Meet one in the morning, and your whole day is ruined."

waitress?" asked the waitress. "They're always telling you about plots, and characters and reading poems to you. Oh, they're simply awful."

"I think," said the teacher, "See Billy Arthur Page 4"
