TOMATOES

Tomatoes are growing, however, little can be done to help this problem.

If a grower will do his pruning by pinching instead of by cutting with a knife, he may be able to reduce the spread of the wilt diseases. Also, county extension agents may be able to help next year in selecting wilt-resistant varieties of tomatoes. But this possibility depends on the type of wilt present.

Dr. Averre said virus diseases have also been noticed in some greenhouses. Again, prevention offers more hope than cures.

Guard against the use of tobacco products in the greenhouse or around the plants, Dr. Averre said. Tobacco can contain the virus that cause tobacco mosaic and certain diseases of tomato plants. Eliminating weeds around the greenhouse before the crop is planted is another way of reducing the possibility of virus infections.

Root-knot nematodes can be a problem, but as with viruses and wilts, little can be done to control nematodes on established plants. Fumigation before planting is the answer to the problem.

Dr. Averre said that greenhouse operators can get excellent information on diseases and other problems from their county agricultural extension agent.

"Remember," he added, "that tomato greenhouse operations require a great deal of attention to pest control and sanitation in addition to good management."
