

Prices On Grains Likely To Remain

New Crop Prospects Probably Will Bring First Change, Bureau Declares

Washington, Jan. 2.—The bureau of agricultural economics finds that "a comparatively stable corn market is in prospect during the next few months. Oat prices have been rather steady since mid-summer, and barley prices have advanced slightly."

Reviewing present and prospective conditions in its December feed grain situation report, the bureau said "there is nothing in the present situation that would indicate material change in prices of these grains until they are influenced by new crop prospects."

Total production of feed grains about equal to the 1928-32 average and 68 percent larger than the small production in 1936 has been estimated by the bureau. The corn crop was estimated at slightly above the 5-year average, since high yields more than offset the reduced acreages. Production of oats, barley, and grain sorghums in 1937 was somewhat below average.

Corn production was well above average in Iowa, Minnesota and in all of the important corn producing states east of the Mississippi river.

The sharp decline in feed grain prices last summer and fall was attributed to the larger crops, the decline in the general level of wholesale prices; more recently, to marked seasonal declines in prices of hogs and cattle. But an active foreign demand for corn and the inauguration of the 1937 corn loan program, on the other hand, "have given some strength to corn prices recently," the bureau said.

Corn production was reported as below average in many of the European countries, and the exportable surplus in Argentina is considerably below that of a year ago. Hence, exports of domestic corn during the winter months probably will be large compared with other recent years. Last year a substantial quantity of corn was imported because of the very short supplies. Exports this year, however, are not expected to influence materially the yearly level of corn prices, since exports for the year probably will represent only a small percentage of the total domestic supply.

The bureau said that most of the export movements of corn probably will take place during the period from December through March, prior to the harvesting of the 1937-38 Argentine crop.
