The Sensible Thing

America's millions have a right to be cocky about their heritage. In fact the masses in dear old U.S. A. must be just a little smarter than their forebears across the billowy Atlantic.

This year we're celebrating the 100th. anniversary of the game of baseball, a competitive contest in which two teams of nine men each get together, throw around among themselves a horsehide covered sphere, crown the same sphere with a circular shaped piece of willow with all their might and main and then race from one sack to another until finally crossing the original plate from which it all started. Watching this display of apparently insane activity (to the average European) may be a crowd composed of anywhere from 10 to 100,000 Americans, all receiving the utmost in enjoyment and being treated to excitement, the likes of which is practically unknown in many lands

On The Other Hand

While scenes such as above march and fight and are havare going on in every city and ing their heads filled with talk hamlet throughout this broad land, young men in many other countries are enrolled in "bund" camps, are learning to

"America's Anchor".....

Baseball is more than a national game. Someone has written "It is America's anchor. It keeps the ship of state fast to its moorings in a balanced life. The Centennial Spirit

Yesterday the mails brought these verses from L. H. Addington, publicity director of the National association of baseball leagues whose office is in Durham. They describe the great Amrican game so clearly that I am reprinting the poem in its entirety below:

1839 — BASEBALL'S CENTENNIAL — 1939 (Dedicated to Baseball upon the occasion of its 100th. Birthday.)

One hundred years of Baseball, Turn back historic pages; The game that's now a century old Has flourished through the ages.

A hundred years of wholesome sport, Replete with skill and action; A game that knows no boundary line Of race or creed or faction.

A game that's thrilled the rich and poor, The mighty and the humble; Each knows the joy of sparkling play, The tragedy of fumble.

The melting pot of human souls, Where elbows rub together; Where banker cheers with tradesman At the crash of bat and leather.

One hundred years of Baseball! May it thrive a thousand more; May it show a winning record When prosperity asks the score.

Allensville Tops Weak Bushy Fork High Team 10-1

Allensville's fast moving high school nine walloped the inexperienced Bushy Fork baseball team at Bushy Fork Tuesday afternoon to the tune of 10-1.
