The Band Box

"For Becoming Clothes You'll Be Coming to The Band Box"

Next To Post Office - Black Mountain

Bored, tired of gossip, quarrelsome with your family or neighbors, life lacking in interest, then read The Exploration of Space, a book on Astronautics, the science of space-travel, by Arthur C. Clarke, chairman of the British Interplanetary Society. This little book of 195 pages tells the "why" and the "how" of astronautics without going into many scientific details. The author says that any intelligent layman can follow what is herein written.

Clark shows by designs and explanation what a spaceship would look like, predicts what we may expect to find on other planets and what we will do when we get there. All speculations are based on facts or at least on probabilities. Furthermore, Clarke impresses the reader as being honest with himself and with his readers. He claims originality for very few of the ideas he presents, most of them having been thrashed out in the British Interplanetary society during the past fifteen years. He gives credit for the beginning of interest in other planets, going as far back as Pythagoras in the 6th century, B. C. Coming down nearer our day, he includes Kepler, Bishops Godwin and Wilkins, Cyrano de Bergerac and Voltaire for their wise speculations, predictions, and anticipations.

Up to the 19th century, much was known about the difficulties but little on how to overcome them. Within this century, stories about space-travel became more common and more scientific. Jules Verne's story, From the Earth to the Moon, a book that interested so many teenagers, is based on sound scientific principles. So Clarke declares. Everyone who read Verne should read The Exploration of Space.

Clark says that many of the ideas in his book must be regarded as possible solutions to the problems of the "how" of space-flight. When we sum up what is known now scientifically and set it beside what was not known in 1900, we must be optimistic about the probabilities of the future. Clarke believes that the "enterprise, skill, and resolution that have made our modern world are sufficient to achieve all" that is described in his book.

Interested in space-flight or no, everyone who reads should read the last chapter of The Exploration of Space. Here the author stimulates thinking through such simple language that a teenager can read and understand. "Desire to see the planets is only an extension of the desire to see what is over the next hill. The mind interested in nothing beyond its town or village stagnates. The rocket threatens to destroy civilization. To use it for exploration is to engender healthy curiosity. We must evolve towards a world outlook. The conquest of space will accelerate that evolution."

No matter what the reader gets out of the chapters dealing with scientific principle, he will enjoy the last chapter of The Exploration of Space, hugely, for the challenge to his thinking.
