What a truly gay setting for family life! The plan is split-level, but actually with three levels. First level is the cellar, where the heating equipment is located, laundry and recreation room. A short flight up leads to living, dining rooms and kitchen. Another short flight up brings you to the bedrooms. All told there are three bedrooms and a study, which can also be converted into a fourth bedroom if desired. There are two full baths to serve the family, and a full dining room in addition to extra breakfast space in the unusually large kitchen. There's space for everyone and everything in this excellent plan, space for work and play and just ordinary living. "The Emerald Crown", by Theodore McCormick.

This novel is laid in ancient Ireland between the 9th and 10th centuries, when petty kings ruled ruthlessly, fought each other as well as the invading Danes. The love story centers around Sionna, the daughter of a king, and Niall Blackknee, a great fighting man of noble birth, but with no bride-price to pay for a princess. The vivid background of the times is as interesting as the tale itself. There was actual luxury in some castles, but among most of the people it was biting poverty. The terror of invasion by the Danes, the ugly barbarism in warfare, all were side by side with deeds of heroism, devotion, and sacrifice.
