REFLECTIONS

by Gordon Greenwood

David, 5-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. Burton Osteen, seems headed for a career with some law enforcement agency. He has an obnoxious eye.

His mother had explained to him that the FBI was looking for men whose pictures appear in the bulletin board in the post office. So when he saw a familiar face peering at him from a bulletin board he put two and two together and blurted out: "Well, mother, there's old Jack Greenwood. What's he done?"

Far out in the country there's a sign which warns: "Cross road—take our advice and humor it. Some who didn't are now pushing up daisies."

Wish I'd known the A. F. Tynes was going to hop over to Old London for an all-excess tour last week. I would have had some points to visit with them not on their list.

They would have loved 50 Greek feet, a quiet little dining room, a quiet little dining room, a quiet little dining room, a quiet little dining room, a quiet little dining room.

That sounds like double talk. That was the way you and it in the blackout and it all worked. The Red Cross lady directed to stand in front of the corner, turn left, cross the curb, turn left at the third, pass one curb, then feel along the side of the building for the steps that come right down to the sidewalk, crawl up the fourth flight and say good-bye to a friend.

In the inky fog of the London blackout we followed the directions on several occasions and we never had one bit of trouble. Then we got smart and tried it in broad daylight. But we didn't make it. We live it or not we never were.
