Army Has Contributed To Civilization
 If the civilization of the bulk of our country were a commodity, it should belong to the Army. The Army conducted nearly all the preliminary explorations of the early days. It alone was able to conduct the early surveys and make the maps which are essential in the opening of a new region. Army engineers initiated most of the methods which are still employed in the geodetic, topographic, and hydrographic surveys of our possessions. The Army was virtually the pioneer of the pioneers.
 As our citizens moved west, they traveled routes which were surveyed by Army engineers, constructed by the Army and protected by military posts. They settled on locations which soldiers had surveyed and their titles were established and valid only because of such surveys. Finally, when the time came to link these outposts to our eastern civilization, it was the Army which located and constructed the railroads. Only after the railroads had developed engineers of their own and the country had become safer for travel, did the Army relinquish its task and turn elsewhere for its missions. The engineers of the Army then began to develop the great waterways, improving
