A Hero In New York.

(From Charlotte Observer.)
The American sense of amusement takes curious turns these days. There's Harry Thaw, a youth of notoriety now become an old man, returned to what is popularly called the "white lights of Broadway." He had been in seclusion in Virginia for many months, but suddenly he turned up in New York, devoting himself to the pastime of old—"entertainment" of young women and the showering upon them of costly gifts. The New York papers made much of his exploitations. Then he went home. But he had received a taste of the old life and he made return, to development of columns of "news stories" for the papers. Readers were given detail of his cold water suppers with a bevy of young women; there was description of his reiment of the price per plate he paid for the supper; of how a row of newspaper men was lined up against the wall watching the proceedings until adjournment in the early hours of the morning, and of how these reporters saw Thaw "carrying on an animated conversation with one of the girls." The American limelight is a great institution and some of those who project themselves into its rays are curious folk. Character does not count. Just so they are in the limelight they are happy. But the county is hard up for a hero when it must run to men like Thaw.

Silly Singing.

(From the Fort Worth Record.)
The former Crown Prince, son of the ex-Kaiser, appeared on the balcony in Bremen and was wildly cheered by crowds in the street. When they had finished cheering the crowd sang "Deutschland Uber Alles." That "Germany Over All" is a song with a fine swing to it. But Germans that sang it when they saw the Crown Prince must lack a sense of humor. The Crown Prince's family fled Germany to the lowest point of defeat in all her history, lower even than when Napoleon told Prussia just how many soldiers she might have.
