Daniel Boone In Kentucky Cemetery

Famous Pioneer Had Hard Time During the Latter Years' Of His Life

"I have no spot that I can call my own whereon to lay my bones." This is one sentence from a simple and affecting memorial addressed to the people and the legislature of Kentucky by the famous pioneer, Daniel Boone. At the age of 60 he had joined the second tide of immigration that was pouring into another newly opened country, hoping at last to satisfy that land hunger which had led the men of his time ever westward and he had met fresh disappointment.

Losing through defective titles the many acres of land he had located there, he appealed to Kentucky, in whose forests he had wintered when hundreds of miles from civilization, with no companions but his guns and his dog; to whose hunting grounds he had guided many parties of hunters, surveyors and settlers; into whose wilds he had cut the first "wilderness road" within whose borders he had built the first fort of the more than a hundred stations that sheltered the early inhabitants from the Indians, and where he had twice located many acres which he had lost through poor trades or unsettled titles.

Judge how touching was such a reminder from a man who in the prime of his life had helped to carve more than a million acres from the wilderness and to make secure its virgin soil for settlement, addressing, too, the generation that occupied that land as a Sovereign state in peace and plenty. Kentucky heeded his cry for aid and forwarded it to Congress, which readily granted him more acres. It is pitiful to relate that the guileless old man lost this also in lawsuits, and at the age of 85 was buried at last in the alien soil of another state.

He was not, however, forgotten by Kentuckians. In 1845 the Legislature brought the remains of Daniel Boone and his wife, Rebecca Bryan Boone, to the state cemetery at Frankfort and reburied them on the brow of a high cliff overlooking the lovely and picturesque valley of the Kentucky River. When their coffins were lowered the pallbearers threw in a few spadefuls of earth; then each one of the thousands of persons gathered from all over the state for the imposing ceremony, passing by, threw in a handful of the soil they were consecrating, as a symbol of his perpetual possession.—Youth Companion.
