It is a negro community, on South East street, and the preachers who made the protest are negroes. They say that the delivery method is regular.

Byrd Introduces Electric Lights In The Antarctic

Equipment Will Enable Members Of Polar Expedition Party To See More Effectively.

New York Times.

For the first time, it is believed, in the history of polar exploration, there are electric lights on the Antarctic continent, or, rather, on the Ross Barrier, a vast ice fringe, where Commander Byrd has his base. Electricity has changed the character of polar exploration more dramatically, perhaps, than any other single factor. Radio waves carry descriptions of events that have occurred that day or the day before to New York across nearly 10,000 miles of space, and electric current furnishes power for a number of other purposes.

How the electricity used by the expeditions is generated, what reserves are carried and how the power is being used reveal some interesting aspects of the new age of south polar exploration.

The Byrd expedition at its base, Little America, has two two-kilowatt Kohler electric generating gasoline engines, it is explained, and these are powerful enough to supply nearly all the electricity necessary for the radio apparatus on land, for lighting and for certain special items of equipment.

For instance, the expedition's physician took with him two electric sunlight lamps, which will be used during the period of darkness that covers all of Antarctica when we are feeling the summer heat of the sun. To prevent ill health, each man will have at least 15 minutes of sunlight treatment every day. The gasoline engines that generate the electricity further serve an important incidental purpose—a by-product of their use. The heat from their exhaust pipes is used to melt snow for drinking and cooking purposes.

But besides these engines there are several other sources of electric power. Com. Byrd carried with him a windmill that looks a little like the windmills farmers use to pump water. It is nothing less than a wind-driven generating plant. When there is a breeze—there is plenty of wind in Antarctica—this generating plant functions, and when it functions exhausted storage batteries are charged.

The electric power used in the radio equipment on board the Byrd airplanes is supplied by a generator coupled directly to the engine. This device is unique, and the expedition is among the first to use it. The usual method of obtaining current for airplane transmitters is from a wind-driven generator. Should the airplane be forced to land on account of engine trouble at a spot distant from the base, communication would not be cut off by the defection of the airplane engine, however. One of three auxiliaries for supplying current would then be called into use. First, the plane carries an auxiliary gas engine and generator to supply power. If that also goes out of commission, there is a hand-driven electric generator, and if that third-line defense fails, there are storage batteries in the plane.

The contrast between the lighting arrangements used by the Byrd expedition and those of earlier explorers is striking. Scott, Amundsen and Shackleton used lamps and candles. The acetylene lamps they carried on some of their voyages southward were considered luxuries. At one point Scott and his men were glad of lamps with wicks made by painstakingly shredding bits of canvas. When Shackleton's ship was locked in the ice pack of Weddell sea (late to be crushed), her generator was used to supply current to electric lights that illuminated the ice surface near the vessel. On Elephant island, where Shackleton's men were marooned after shipwreck, they read by the light of smoky flares of surgical dressing gauze wicks stuck in sardine tins filled with slubber.

The Byrd expedition carries emergency lamps. Cooking is done over coal and kerosene stoves. But tonight when one man or another down there decides to while away an hour by reading in one of the 10 books he chose to take to that white continent he will probably do it in the light of an electric bulb very much like that by which the New Yorkers in his apartment reads his newspaper.

Twilight has now come to Antarctica. Day by day the hours during which the sun shines grow fewer. Daily the temperatures become lower, and about May 1 the sun will be darkness, with occasional faint glimmerings of light in the distant sky. Little work can then be done outdoors, for blizzards swoop continually across the barrier, making it dangerous for men to venture even a few feet from their huts. But inside the men will be snug and as comfortable as crowded conditions permit. They have a good library, and what no other Antarctic explorer ever had—electric light.

In Brunswick county, farmers and bankers have been holding conferences looking to the purchase of pure bred dairy cattle for family cows.

To improve drainage conditions on their farms, several landowners in Duplin county have cooperated in ordering five cars of tile.
