Rooster Cares For Motherless Brood

Does Best To Imitate Maternal Cluck As He Scratches For 22 Biddies.

Elkin—"Cock-a-doodle-doo" no longer is the early morning signal piped forth by the king of a certain Elkin poultry yard that a new day is about to dawn.

"Cluck! cluck!" is now the hourly song of the once lordly Chanticleer, since he has voluntarily opened his heart and imposed upon himself the responsibility of hovering and scratching for an orphaned brood of 22 tender biddies.

The mother hen, hungered from a faithful three weeks seige on a big nest of eggs, choked to death in an effort to swallow a huge morsel, the very day that she made her debut with her unusually large family of biddies.

Mrs. John Ipeck, of North Bridge street, owner of the fowls, was dismayed by the helpless shrieks and pitiful wails of "peep peep" as the baby chicks darted wildly about. The problem of finding a foster parent was swiftly solved when the big rooster coaxed the motherless brood under his broad wings and tried his best to imitate the maternal cluck of the deceased mother.

By constant practice, Chanticleer's cluck has softened to the tenderness of a mother hen and constantly nestruts about the poultry inclosure always on the search of an insect or a worm to calm the shrill chorus of a growing and always hungry family of biddies.

How to poison the cotton boll weevil is told briefly in leaflet 37 issued by the United States department of agriculture at Washington.
