"Gardner Plan" Be Pressed In The East

Kinston—Efforts to boost dairying, poultrying and pork-raising in the eastern part of North Carolina will be made by many agencies during the next few months. Governor Gardner's farming plan is being studied with a view to its application to this section, to which it is better adapted than to the rest of the state, in the opinion of some experts. The executive on a visit to Kinston some weeks ago declared he saw many fine fields and no animals in the parts of Pitt, Greene and Lenoir counties he passed through. Eastern Carolina with a million population can feed 10,000,000. "It is the most fertile region in the eastern part of the United States, and tens of millions in the Middle Atlantic and Northern States are ready to become consumers of its food products," the Eastern Carolina Chamber of Commerce claims. Tin sometimes "catches" an infectious disease known as tin pest, which can be propagated by inoculation. An examination of more than 3,000 apparently healthy persons showed that they had on the average two defects or diseases.
