THREE BORN IN 3 STATES YET IN JUST ONE HOME

Story From Wyoming In Paradox That Belongs To Early Annual Of Western State.

Brunt Fork, Wyo.—The puzzling truth of three children born in three different states but in the same house that never was moved is a romantic paradox that belongs to the early annals of Wyoming at old Fort Bridger.

In that 12 by 18 foot log cabin were born the three children involved—George Stoll, April 20, 1867; William Stoll, April 13, 1869; and Lizzie toll Kirkendall, June 8, 1871.

George was born in Utah; William in Dakota and Lizzie in Wyoming.

The ground at Fort Bridger was originally Mexican soil. After it was ceded to the United States in the Mexican war settlement, it became Utah territory for a time. Then in the adjustment of boundaries, the land lying east of the Wasatch range was surveyed into Dakota territory, and remained so until the territory of Wyoming was staked out about 1870.

Scantly remnants of projecting logs, long anchored within the ground, are the only remaining evidence of the abandoned home at the former village of Merle, once an outskirt hamlet a mile west of Fort Bridger.

The house was originally built, it is supposed, and occupied by Jim Bridger within the limits of the old post. During a dispute as to the clouded title affecting the property during the early fifties, government employees moved several disputed houses outside the stockade limits, including the historic one in question.

The story of the house was related by one of the children, William Stoll, for 52 years a resident of Brunt Fork. Stoll lived his first eight years in the house and since then has lived in this region known as Brunt Fork. Stoll said he has lived in a log house his entire life, without electric lights or other modern appurtenances.
