Negro Excursion Brings Small Crowd

Today is the high day at the Cleveland county negro fair which has been under way this week and closes Saturday night. The attendance during the day has been very disappointing, due to the busy season at night the "gate" has been very gratifying.

An excursion from Salisbury brought about 100 visitors from distant cities to witness the football game this afternoon between Salisbury Price high school and a Charlotte high, both colored teams. The excursion crowd was also very disappointing in view of the fact that the fair and special train had been widely advertised. Tomorrow being Saturday is expected to outstrip any previous day in attendance.

Low School Rating In County Is Explained By Supt. Grigg

es. Our people are conservative and all school buildings have been built without show. There are single buildings in adjoining counties which cost more than the county's entire indebtedness for schools declared Mr. Grigg.

School Had A Balance.
For the year 1928-29 the school budget for Cleveland's rural schools was $364,694 for the six months term and at the end of the year there was a cash balance of $16,000.

Many tax payers have an idea that the cost of transporting school children by truck is very costly, yet Mr. Grigg says there is not a cent levied against the tax payers to pay for such transportation, this cost being met out of the state's school equalization fund. The state allows $8 per child, yet last year Cleveland transported its children for $5.75 per child.

Over 10,000 Pupils.
In the rural schools of the county there are 10,238 pupils, 259 teachers, 16 janitors and 44 truck drivers. Each year the number of pupils of course increases, but they increase at such a rate, it is some wonder where they come from, said Mr. Grigg.

Stresemann Was Fine German Statesman

At End Of War He Became Leader Of German Nation's Fight To Recover Self.

Ashville Citizen.
Germany has suffered, in the death of Dr. Gustav Stresemann, her foreign minister, a loss that is beyond calculation. Beyond dispute, he was the greatest German statesman of the world. No man has done more to help restore the peace of Europe. No other has done as much to help win back for his own country a place in the family of nations. His work, crowned as it has been with extraordinary success, is the more striking in that it has been accomplished in good part in spite of ill health which at last has conquered him only with his passing.

More than any other German leader Dr. Stresemann had the capacity to see the problems with which his people were confronted in their true perspective. His courage and persuasiveness enabled him to acquire a leadership the full fruits of which are only now becoming clearly evident.

When the world war ended Stresemann quickly saw the import of the changes which had been effected and which were in prospect. Germany was in a welter of confused thought. Its leaders and parties were wrangling bitterly among themselves. Stresemann cut loose from all the existing parties with their stock ideas. By his own forcefulness he created a new party and set to work boldly in the interest of reconciliation and to lay the foundations of a new peace.

His prestige in Europe grew even more rapidly than it had grown at home. But the successes which he had won at Geneva strengthened his power at Berlin. Always he took the broad view and the long view. He won the friendship and the confidence of France and of England and of the other nations. Year by year and almost month by month he saw his policies increasingly justified. There was never any question of his sincerity. He fought for his own country but did so in a way that commanded respect from the statesmen of other countries. He made them appreciate Germany's point of view. He made the Germans appreciate the point of view of the rest of the world.

No one can measure now what the passing of such a leader may mean. We can only hope that in the better atmosphere which he had helped to create, in the larger understanding which he had been instrumental in promoting, a worthy successor will be found to take his place and carry on his influence.

Aderholt Shot By Police, Is Argued contempt for a man like that," the lawyer cried.

Mr. McCall's speech was a reply to that of Mr. Hoey and was delivered after a recess which followed the first speech.

Mr. Hoey closed his speech with an emotional appeal which left two of the jurors wiping tears from their eyes.

Mr. McCall's speech made the issue one between mill owners and mill workers. He charged the cotton mills owned Gastonia "body and soul," including the police department.

Hoey Opens Arguments.

Clyde R. Hoey, of Shelby, opening the arguments for the state at 9 o'clock. The courtroom was considerably more than half filled with spectators, which was a large crowd when compared to former days. Mr. Hoey, before he launched into the plunging cadences which have made his oratory famous in North Carolina, spoke in low tones before the jury in a brief rehearsal of the state's objectives. He reminded the twelve men that in the state's view conspiracy had been proved and therefore it was not necessary to show who fired that fatal shot, only to show that the union leaders acted in concert and were equally guilty.

Mr. Hoey pointed out there had been discrepancies in the evidence of the state's case, that itself being evidence that the witnesses were telling the truth. He did not charge, he said, that the defense witnesses lied, only "that they were exceedingly economical in the use of the truth."

The lawyer argued to the jury that the controversy was not between the defendants and the Gastonia police personally, but was a part of a great war between the law and lawlessness.

"Has the time come when it is a disgrace for a man to wear the uniform of the law in North Carolina?" he demanded. "I saw the sneers of contempt were not directed against Chief Aderholt and Tom Gilbert but at the law."

"Before Fred Beal came, Gastonia was a peaceful city. There were no riots, no bloodshed. Beal came down from Massachusetts. He had a right to do that. He organized a union and called a strike. He had a right to do that. But, remember, gentlemen, violence and rioting began the second day afterward and, yet he would have you believe he did not counsel violence."

The lawyer then went into an analysis of the evidence. His conclusions included that Joseph Harrison was shot by his fellows and that Beal, who lay on the floor during the shooting, was a coward. Mr. Hoey, taking up the defense witnesses one at a time, declared that Paul Sheppard's testimony was unworthy of belief, becoming so when he declared that Chief Aderholt fired a shot when all other eyewitnesses declared the chief did not.

The testimony of C. D. Saylor was not worth considering, the state thought, pointing out that it was Saylor who had testified that Solicitor John G. Carpenter and Major A. L. Bulwinkle led the Gastonia mob.

George Carter the lawyer thought was the guard who fired the shot that killed Aderholt. Mr. Hoey characterized the letter from the strike committee to Governor O. Max Gardner that the strikers would protect their hall at all costs as "insulting."

The lawyer then drew a word picture of "that man of peaceful meekness," Chief Aderholt on his death bed, who said:

"I don't know why they shot me in the back, I did nothing to them."

Mr. Hoey spoke an hour and 35 minutes.

J. D. McCall opened the argument for the defense. Mr. McCall opened with the remark that Judge Barnhill had been entirely fair in the trial and he expected the jury also to be.

Bitting Oratory.
"Produce one line of testimony in this trial which shows that the defendants had malice against Chief Aderholt," he demanded suddenly. "On the other hand our witnesses said that he was a good man and I believe it."

Mr. McCall charged that public sentiment had been inflamed against the defendants. "Who has done it?" he cried, and answered, "the cotton mills."

Later, in another of the bursts of oratory that featured his speech, he demanded, "What's the matter with Gastonia, anyway? It is owned body and soul by the cotton mills and they own the police department there, too. A handful of might is better than a bagful of right."

He bitterly assailed "organized greed to take charge of our government and run it for private gain." "Let factory owners get together and organize and that's high finance and patriotism; let factory workers organize and it is treason and anarchy."

No Plans Yet For Rebuilding Hotel

all over America and in Europe. Manager Henry Martin in his plan of using hotel property to cut operating expenses had in recent weeks stocked the property with a flock of chickens, with turkeys, pigs and cows, and in another month or so he would have had, he believes, the major portion of his own supplies there. With all these arrangements to get the hostelry on a better footing under way the fire came as a considerable blow to him.

Beauregard Coming.
It was stated here early this morning that Mr. Beauregard, of New York, Martin's partner in operating the hotel, was expected during the day. Just what may result from the conference between them is not known. Some reports about Shelby have it that Beauregard may advance plans to stockholders for rebuilding in which he may take an interest.

No Cleveland Hotel For Him To Visit

The burning of the Cleveland Springs hotel this week may this fall inconvenience any number of prominent easterners who have been accustomed to spending the season here. On the morning after the hotel was burned Mr. J. A. Wilson received a card from Dr. C. O. Peters, Amherst college professor, stating that he hoped to get down to Cleveland in time to see the white cotton fields and the beautiful scenery of the autumn season in Carolina.

Burke Highway Head Is Killed

Lee Rusk, Age 60, Is Killed When Flood-Weakened Bridge Falls On Him.

Morganton, Oct. 17.—The ghost of floods that swept North Carolina disastrously weeks ago returned today to take the life of Lee Rusk, superintendent of Burke county roads.

Rusk's breath was crushed out this morning about 41 o'clock between falling timbers of a bridge over the South Fork river, on a county road branching out from the Morganton-Shelby highway some distance from the city.

With a crew of workmen, Rusk, a native of this county and a man of about 60 years of age, went this morning to repair the bridge, seriously weakened by the recent high water. Some preliminary work was done. Then something went wrong. Without warning the bridge gave way. Rusk was caught by the falling timbers and died within ten minutes. No other of the eight or ten workmen was injured.
