THIN SKINS

There is an old saying, "He who hath a thin skin feels every touch a wound," a trait that in this speedy era is a serious handicap.

As he views himself, the "thin-skinned" man is sensitive, or easily hurt, but a psychologist might unkindly diagnose his delicate sensibilities as "amour propre," self love, or pride of opinion.

In the hurried give and take of daily contacts, life goes hard with one who is quick to take offense or unable to show a spirit amenable to correction. To have to guard against wounding these tender egos, wastes time and energy that the busy man

Unless one's work is perfect—and where can such be found?—pointing out shortcomings and mistakes is the only way to improve performance. What justification, therefore, can there be for the attitude that takes criticism with an ill grace?

The man who "bristles up" if attention that appears critical is directed at his efforts, shows a degree of intolerance for the other man's point of view that must seriously limit his own usefulness.

The man who, offering a suggestion that is not adopted, thereupon feels hurt, and sulkily takes it as a personal affront—the ungracious recipient of constructive criticism who "freezes up,"is ultimately left to go his own way to failure, unchecked.

The "thin-skinned" man is ill-adapted to business, and business cannot, and should not, adapt itself to his idiosyncrasies. Manly hardihood can withstand the shocks of life and profit thereby without, on the other hand, developing the impervious hide of a

The disposition to accept criticism as well-meant and valuable, distinguishes the man whose expanding mind realizes that he has much to learn, from the one whose mind has stopped growing and who, in his own conceit, already "knows it all."

A great philosopher has said, "The purpose of life is the gaining of experience." Those who have something to teach, and those who have something to learn, are too greatly absorbed in their work ever to exhibit the foolish touchiness of the "thin-skinned."
