St. Elmo's Fire Named By Sailors

Strange Electrical Phenomena Has Several Names. Seen Near Pike's Peak.

A few weeks ago people living in Colorado Springs, near the foot of the famed Pike's Peak, were startled to observe what appeared to be blue flares on the snowclad summit of the mountain. At first it was thought they were distress signals. They disappeared one night only to reappear the next. An airplane hovered over the peak, but learned nothing.

The mystery was cleared up by scientific diagnosis—the flares were negative discharges of electricity from the atmosphere to the earth, popularly known as St. Elmo's fire. If the discharges had been positive, they would have been red. Thunderstorms and heavy snowstorms often cause St. Elmo's fire. The discharges are from the air or any point, as the masts of a ship, a steeple, a tree, points of rock, even the outstretched fingers of the hand. Often the discharge makes a sizzling or crackling sound. The phenomenon is identical, electricity in the laboratory.

Sailors christened this phenomenon "St. Elmo's fire." Observing it from the tips of masts or other parts of the ship, they regarded it as a visible sign from their patron saint, St. Elmo—an Italian corruption of the name of St. Erasmus, which comes, according to Webster's New International Dictionary, from the Italian (or Portuguese) "Corpo Santo," holy body, or from the Latin "Corpus Sancti," body of a saint.

St. Elmo's fire appears sometimes single, sometimes double. It has many nicknames. Double sailors often call it Castor and Pollux, the names of the twin stars. Pliny records this in his "Natural History." Single, St. Elmo's fire has been called simply Castor, or Helena, the latter being the name of the sister of Castor and Pollux. The double, composit, or Castor and Pollux, signifies to sailors the end of a storm. Helena, or the single composit, may be an unlucky sign.

Kansas City Women Run Novel Factory

Kansas City, Mo.—Taking a hint from the first American housewives—the Indians—whose pueblo kitchenettes bloomed with gayly colored cooking dishes, two Kansas City women have built a factory which produces more than a million articles a year.

But the Indian housewives failed to give their colored pottery a name and it remained for Miss Ada M. Kassmer, one of the partners, to coin the word "beautilities." The other partner is Miss Florence M. Fenner.

Eight years ago, while on a vacation trip together, the plans for the business were made. Pooling their resources the two young women found they had $68. Perhaps it is the thought of this small amount of money that has made them fill their factory with young women and girls who are students in art schools about the city, for no man operates this business.

At first the products were decorated candy jars, cookie boxes, perfume boxes, dornies and jardiniere.
