PUSHING BACK THE LOAN SHARK'S LAST FRONTIER

Shaded area indicates states which have failed to pass adequate laws to protect the public from usury evils.

In all that territory east of the Mississippi river only five states have failed, so far, to pass legislation based on the Uniform Small Loan act worked out by the Russell Sage Foundation after long study of the "loan shark" situation. These states are Vermont, Kentucky, Alabama and North and South Carolina.

In these states the loan shark, elsewhere generally outlawed and beaten by remedial loan legislation, continues to ply his traffic charging often 20 per cent or more a month. The Uniform Small Loan act requires close regulation of the small loan business and in most states puts a maximum interest charge for loans of $300 or less at 3 1/2 per cent a month. No fines or other concealed charges are permitted and interest can be charged only on unpaid balances.

Any small loan official who violates the law is subject to fine and imprisonment and his license to operate is taken away. In states lacking this legislation the loan shark commonly violates the usually meager and toothless usury laws and boldly exacts tribute from his thousands of victims. Washington, D. C., has a small loan act said to be only partially satisfactory.

The strength of the Small Loan act is that it offers something which corrects an age-old evil; in other words, fulfills a necessity.
