A Sailor Lost To The Sea. Here was an earth-held man who should have been A laughing pirate on a white-winged ship. His dreams were all of wild adventuring On far-off seas where only red moon slip Across the bows or tangle in the spars. He thought of gleaming sunsets over water. Of golden dawns and black-teethed gales and stars. And sea-denied, yet secretly he sought her.

He was bound inland with his windy passion. Enslaved at desks with fever in his eyes. Facing his floor at night, he strove to fashion The old remembrance of the seagull-cries. And here he lies, as rooted as this tree. Giving to earth what he could not give the sea. —Frances M. Frost.
