ONE VOYAGE MORE

One voyage more and my sea-beaten bark
Makes harbor and strikes sail, quenching her light
All but two lanterns hung aloft to mark
For other craft her anchorage at night
Then I may sit alone on the after-deck
Laying my life again in a long dream
Of old dangers, hurricanes, rocks and wreck
While the stars rise to make the water gleam
Or take an evening turn ashore to find
Some quayside inn where the old seamen meet
To talk of ports they too have left behind,
And ships and shipmates of the merchant fleet
There will be pipes lighted and blue smoke heavy
Among the beams, and glasses clinking round,
And someone telling lies about the navy,
And songs perhaps, and everything well-found
Afterwards, either way, berthed quiet below,
For once with no cold midnight watch to keep,
I'll be content to hear the ebb tide flow
Under my ports, and maybe fall asleep.
—Edward Davison.
