WHEN HEAVY'S WAS SHELBY'S LUCHOW

The death last week of Heavy (Earl) Lybrand will bring back to many Shelby men just a few years out of the fast young set memories of the halcyon days when Heavy's cafe was the most popular night hang out in the city-a place of camaraderie and good-natured zest.

The unpretentious cafe on West Marion street, within sight of the court square, was the city's first approach to an all-night eating house. It was there that the boys began to gather from their dates about 11 at night and from that hour on until 1 in the morning they straggled in one at' a time. No night or date was complete unless it wound up at Heavy's for a chat with the 300-pound proprietor and the boys already gathered there. At the same time it was the sport center of the city, the gathering place of the football players in the days when football was Shelby's major pastime, hobby and business. And with the players, as usual were the usual hangers on and hero-worshippers.

Just as Heavy knew every player and practically every play in the signal repertoire of the Gurley and Morris elevens, so he knew all the inside dope on the love affairs of the fellows who dropped in each night from 11 until 1.

It was in a way of speaking a family circle. Heavy never seemed to care very much whether the boys purchased anything or not, but naturally they did. Nearly every fellow had his favorite for his midnight lunch, and Heavy knew them so well that once they hit the door he sang out the order without moving from his accustomed table and the everpresent cup of coffe and cigarette.

The most popular of the run of orders were bacon-and-tomato and son's Drug Store. Anderson alleges mansion at which Governor Gardhamburger sandwiches. The passing of the proprietor will carry into many homes about the city memories of courting days, or rather nights that included a stop at Heavy's. A majority of the girls usually Past Utterances were skeptical about talking too much in Heavy's presence. They knew that, due to the confidential chats in the late night hours, he knew almost to a "t" how every love affair in the city was progressing.

So regular were the boys who dropped in at night that Heavy had a roll call. The roll was never written down but he could run over the list on a split-second's notice. Around midnight every night he would What Charlie Jonas Said In 1931 single out the missing regulars. "So-and-so," he would say, "must be sick tonight or out of town. Anybody seen him?"

The gang first started gathering at Heavy's back before the marriage of the late Fred Wagner and in the days when the now happilymarried Connelly Eskridge never wasted time in dates. Gradually the circle grew, reaching its peak two or three years later. But three or torney has been raging so furiously dence tending to prove her innecfour years ago the gang began to scatter.
