

Tom Dedmon Raising Pheasants For Release In Cleveland County

Tom Dedmon, enterprising young farmer living on the northeastern edge of the city, is raising pheasants and is doing it on a more extensive scale than any one else in the county. Pheasant raising is encouraged by the game division of the State Department of Conservation and Development for the two-fold purpose of increasing the supply of wild game and destroying insects which do untold damage to field and garden crops.

The ring-necked variety is the most prolific in it is this variety which Mr. Dedmon is specializing on. The male bird is beautiful with a varied assortment of bright feathers while the female is speckled and drab like the wild quail. A full grown pheasant weighs from two and a half to three pounds and makes a delicious dish of white meat. In their native haunts they rove the woods and fields and destroy the insects which are the most costly menace to growing crops.

Many Pairs Released. Already Mr. Dedmon has released about 50 pairs in various sections of the county and a check-up reveals that they are thriving and multiplying. He has about 40 birds on hand and is specializing now on the sale of eggs for hatching, selling the eggs at reduced prices to get them started on the game preserves of the county. There has never been an open hunting season for pheasants in Cleveland county, but Game Warden H. C. "Shorty" Long, says the State game warden will no doubt declare a short open season in a few years when pheasants become more plentiful. Then the sportsmen will enjoy a form of hunting to which they have not been accustomed for many years.

Heavy Layers. A pheasant hen will lay about 60 eggs during the laying season. She may go as high as 105 in a season. Mr. Dedmon gets his hatches under bantam hens for they make good mothers and are more constantly on duty during the setting period. This is the best method while the birds are in captivity. Of course when they are released, the pheasant hen does her own setting and caring for her young. When they are released the pheasants usually roam around on the farms where they belong and keep in droves like partridges. The pheasant eggs are bluish gray, somewhat smaller in size than a guinea egg.

Farmers declare the pheasant to be one of the most valuable wild birds for insect eaters and for delicious meat. Many farmers visit the Dedmon pheasant farm and study the birds. Mr. Dedmon is an authority on raising them and has done more than any other individual in the county to encourage their propagation throughout the county.
