

Former Painter Becomes Farmer, Licks Depression

Kinston—Hamp Brown does not believe in the depression. At least he does not believe it is worth worrying over.

"The de—dest pain in the world," to Brown are people who can work but accept charity. Those are his exact words. It is possible he admitted today, that there are able-bodied persons unable to provide for themselves, but he can't understand it.

Brown was a house painter until the depression came. He did not know how to plow a furrow. But he became a farmer when he became desperate. Now he, his wife and their five children are making "an excellent living" on the farm. "We have bought the place, and are paying off the mortgage right along. I work at my trade when I can get work, and I pick up quite a lot of jobs by looking for them. I am not worrying over the depression. I have beaten the depression."

The tree-frog has the power of changing color to resemble more closely the surface upon which it desires to be inconspicuous. It can change from a dark hue to a light one in about twenty minutes.
