Johnson's move to increase credit velocity was intended chiefly to help industry meet NRA's higher payrolls, but it blended smoothly with President Roosevelt's determined efforts to expand oredit and boost farm prices.

Further, it coincided with the coming to Washington of Henry Bruere, president of the Bowery bank of New York, who Savings boarded Mr. Roosevelt's train as # headed toward the White House from New York City. Bruere was expected to co-ordinate the entire credit expansion campaign.
