Science Hails New "Age of Glass"

Glass in process of manufacture.

Recent inventions in the glass industry promise to introduce an "age of glass" in which this highly important produce will play an increasingly vital part in modern life. A process has been perfected which produces glass which has half the strength of steel and is three times as elastic. Science has also perfected glass which has heat-absorbing powers by virtue of its elimination of the infra-red rays of the sun. Another new type of glass transmits the heat rays but cuts off light, an invaluable aid to medical science. An increasing number of uses have been found for glass in construction and decoration of modern homes and buildings. An example of the commercial possibilities of further use of glass is illustrated by its success when built into a panel of containers used by a large cannery. Sales jumped sharply because customers could inspect the product before purchasing.
