Political Rumblings Indicate Possible Revival Of NRA In '36

By BYRON PRICE (Chief of Bureau, The Associated Press, Washington)

The effort to revive NRA, or at least to preserve its essentials in one form or another, quietly is assuming proportions which seem to insure widespread discussion during the coming session of congress and in the 1936 campaign.

Already there have been many rumblings of speculation about the fact that NRA headquarters carries on, with hundreds of employees, months after the supreme court declared the codes unconstitutional; but less public notice has been taken of numerous scattered hints that the venture scarcely can be regarded as a closed incident.

Until recently, the official explanation of the continued presence of a large NRA staff in Washington was that it was compiling a "history" of the experiment, and was seeking to conserve for the future the lessons learned in the drafting and administration of the codes.

Just before he left for his Pacific trip, however, the president issued without comment an executive order appointing George L. Berry "coordinator for industrial cooperation" and giving him powers of considerable scope with respect to the conduct of what was left of NRA.

Washington took no particular note of this act, and the country appears to have been even less interested in it. "Coordinators" of one kind and another have come and gone with frequency on the national scene, and most of them have left little trace.

It now develops that Major Berry has been taking his job quite seriously. He has not been saying much for publication, but he has not been idle. What little he has said, and the evidences of his activity, have been exceedingly interesting.

Baby specialists administered adrenalin, human milk was rushed from a hospital, keepers scurried about in high excitement. But Director Floyd Young's hope of being the first to raise an orang born in captivity vanished, when the pound and a half Simian succumbed to malnutrition.

"Uncle Bob" Has Served 55-Years On The Sentinel

WINSTON-SALEM, Nov. 4.—Last week, Bob Carmichael, Sentinel newsman, hurried into the news room and anxiously inquired if his telegraphed list of Methodist appointments from Salisbury had made the second edition deadline.

The unusual thing about this commonplace incident was that no one on the Sentinel thought it unusual. For between the first newspaper chore begun by Bob Carmichael and his latest out-of-town assignment stretch 55 years of newspaper work, all of it on The Twin "Uncle Bob" went to work for The Western Sentinel on November 1, 1880, nearly five years before the daily was started. He has been with
