DURHAM, April 24.—More than 10,000 persons have visited the Sarah P. Duke flower garden at Duke university so far this spring, and the beauty of the 20-acre tract in which more than 200,000 flowering plants are being cultivated is just beginning.

The tulip beds are at their height, with the reds, pinks, lavenders, and yellows predominating. Half of the 20,000 bulbs have blossomed and the remaining ones will continue to blossom for several more days. A feature of the tulip collection is the bed of black tulip from Holland. When the variety was first cultivated many years ago a single bulb sold for many thousands of dollars. This is the first year for the Duke tulips.

Dwarf and intermediate iris, in blue, purple, yellow, and white, are beginning to achieve their height in the rock garden.
