FEMA Offers $874 To Clear Streams

Brunswick County will probably not accept an offer of $874 in disaster assistance to help clear streams of debris in the wake of Hurricane Diana, County Manager Billy Carter indicated Friday.

But he said a Jan. 7 survey by state and federal emergency management officials will still be useful to the county, possibly helping to chart a new direction in water management.

"One thing it will do is provide adequate documentation of the damage if another program becomes available (as a source of funding)," he said.

Also, the information should help the county look at future directions and emphasis for its water management program.

Over the past several years, he said, the county has emphasized ditching to help control mosquitoes.

"Now that we've got a ditching network, Carter raised the hypothetical question, 'do we need to look now at more snagging and stream clearance so that our ditching will still be effective.'"

The Federal Emergency Management Agency offered $874 in assistance to help clear three streams they agreed posed an immediate threat to life and/or improve property. The local contribution to the repairs would be $250 per site. Another 73 sites identified as blocked by the county did not meet the agency's criteria for assistance, Carter said. Either the damage did not exceed $250 or FEMA representatives thought the work should be handled as part of routine waterway maintenance.
