Some Shrimpers May Benefit From Delay Of Inshore TED Requirements

Despite recent approval by the U.S. House of Representatives of a plan which would delay the required use of Turtle Excluder Devices (TEDs) in inshore waters for another two years, some local shrimpers may never see the benefits.

If approved, the legislation would allow shrimpers in bays, sounds, rivers and inlets to continue operating without TEDs through May 1, 1990.

But according to Rich Carpenter, Wilmington District Manager of the N.C. Division of Marine Fisheries, the legislation would only help the small-scale shrimpers who trawl in the Atlantic Intracoastal Waterway and local rivers. He added that it would not help the large shrimpers who operate in the Atlantic Ocean along the southeast coast of the United States.

The TED is a device sewn into shrimp nets which allows captured sea turtles, which may otherwise drown in the nets, to escape through a small opening.

While environmentalists have argued that shrimpers kill about 12,000 turtles each year with their trawls, fishermen claim that the TEDs are costly, reduce the shrimp catch and are dangerous to crewmen.

Current requirements call for the use of TEDs starting next March in the Gulf of Mexico and May in the Atlantic Ocean.

Walter Jones, chairman of the House committee on merchant marine and fisheries, initiated the legislation as a means of helping shrimpers in his district, which includes Pamlico Sound, as well as many others along the Atlantic seaboard.

The Senate is expected to consider the legislation when it reconvenes in January.

As part of the proposed legislation, the National Marine Fisheries Service (NMFS) would concentrate on inshore testing of TEDs over the next two years to determine if there are any means of protecting endangered sea turtles in these waters other than TEDs. All species of sea turtle are on the threatened or endangered species lists.

According to Sue Waldron, merchant marine and fisheries committee press secretary, the NMFS has conducted extensive research on TEDs in offshore waters but very little inshore.

Thank You!
