HOW MUCH IS ENOUGH?
When you are ready to purchase your next home, how much will you offer as "earnest money" when you sign the agreement of sale? If you are a seller, how much earnest money should you require from buyers?
Before answering those questions, let's examine why an earnest money deposit is needed at all. An agreement to purchase real estate of any kind requires a written document detailing the terms of the purchase. This agreement becomes a legally binding contract once it is signed. One of the requirements is that "consideration" (money or other property) be paid in exchange for the property itself.
Since the seller is obligated to give good title to the property by signing the agreement, it becomes logical that the purchaser should show "good faith" or that they are in "earnest" by placing an advance on the purchase price, a "deposit," on the table. This is done upon signing the agreement of sale.
The actual amount is determined by the parties to the agreement. It is negotiated. It should be a substantial sum serving as a "good faith" guarantee that the purchaser intends to complete the sale. At the same time, it need not be a prohibitive amount resulting in no agreement at all. It is also a wise move, for a purchaser to offer more than expected if an offer to purchase is being made at a low price. This action indicates serious intent to the seller.
