Kids Learn About Disabilities

Fifth grade students at Bolivia Elementary School recently learned what it's like to be disabled while trying to function in a non-disabled world.

Thommi Arnold, publicity coordinator for the school, said that teachers Retha Rusk, Levada Holmes and Sheila Woodall introduced the idea to their students in the form of a game, selecting a variety of disabilities for different groups of children.

Some of the students wore rubberbands around their wrists and fingers to simulate the feeling of arthritis, while another group of students placed cottonballs in their ears to experience hearing impairment.

Other children were selected to use walkers or wheelchairs.

Ms. Arnold said that at the close of a morning of experimentation, students were assigned to write about the games in the journals they keep at school during the academic year.

She said that the fifth graders agreed that, despite the variety of disabilities, they all had more difficulty doing common tasks which they usually take for granted. One student wrote that he would never laugh at or make fun of a disabled person again.

The exercise was part of the school curriculum for the students' health and literature classes, said Ms. Arnold.
