Milk delivered in bottles is something new to Archie Patton. Archie likes his milk fresh from the cow, as he is accustomed to having it at his home on a farm in McDowell County. Just now Archie is visiting his grandmother, Mrs. P. H. Small, in Hertford. He refuses to drink the milk served there. "I don't like canned milk," he explained. "But, Archie, this is not canned milk," he was told. "Well," answered Archie, "I haven't seen any cow."

So much road construction work going on in the county has been very stimulating to business generally. Too much of this work cannot be done to suit the merchants, who probably more than any other class feel the effects of the pay rolls.

That the oil mill is to be rebuilt shortly is good news. Not only will employment be given to a considerable number of men during the construction of the mill, but a larger number will be given permanent employment in the operation of the mill.

C. P. Morris, manager of the Eastern Cotton Oil Company, stepped in at Anderson's Drug Store on Tuesday night and was waiting at the fountain to be served a Coca Cola when a small boy came in and, stepping up to Mr. Morris said, "Mother says please step out to the car a minute."

Mr. Morris obligingly stepped out to find a strange lady seated in the car at the curb. "Bring me two Coca Colas and three glasses of water, please," she said. Bowing politely, Mr. Morris walked back into the drug store and passed on the order.

It happened a long time ago, in the days when North Carolina first "went dry." A certain prominent Hertford citizen got to imbibing a little too freely of the cup that cheers to please his wife. One night when he was "whooping it up" quite considerably with the boys down town the good lady appealed to a close friend of her husband whom she knew did not drink to try to bring her erring husband home and if possible to get his liquor away from him. She said she felt sure he had a quantity of bootleg stuff stored away.

The friend found The Man and confidentially requested him to give him a drink. "Now, I don't want to drink with these youngsters," he said. "I do not want them to see me take a drink, you know." The Man, always obliging, was glad to give his friend a drink of his own liquor and led him to the hiding place. There was a gallon jug almost full of corn liquor.

"I don't like mine like this," explained The Friend. "Let's go up to your house and get some sugar and some water and mix the drinks." The Man was too much befuddled to realize the game, so he acquiesced, and the pair set out. When they got there The Man opened the door, and right there his wife took charge of the situation and a lot of explanation was in order. The Friend was quick to seize the opportunity to escape, but he was left with the jug to hold. He didn't know what to do with it, so decided to take it to his office and hide it away.

The next day The Man needed a drink badly. He was down bright and early to ask The Friend for a little "pick up." Realizing his condition, The Friend agreed, and led him to the place of concealment and gave him a drink.

The Friend says he forgot all about the hidden liquor after that. The incident just went along out of his mind and a long time went by. Then, one day, after several months,

The Man appeared at his office and said he needed a little drink. He said he was feeling wretched and needed some. He said his wife had said he could have a small drink and he did not have a drop.

The Friend walked over to the hiding place and pulled out the jug. Each man glanced at the jug and then each glanced at the other's face. The expression on each face might be described as vacant. And that might also describe the condition of the jug. There wasn't a drop of liquor in it.

"So you drank my liquor!" exclaimed The Man. "And after you wouldn't let me have it! I must say you are a fine friend!"

Explanations seemed to be in order. But The Friend didn't have an explanation. He was quite at sea. Finally he became articulate, "I do not understand it," he said, "any better than you do. But the liquor was in my charge. I took it from you, and I will pay you for it. How much did it cost you?" We'll talk about that later," replied The Man and left in apparent disgust.

The Man likes to tell the tale now, because he says he found a key to his Friend's office and he had slipped in at will and taken a little "nip" whenever he pleased, which explains the dry jug.
