Carolina Bird-Lore

THE GOLDEN EAGLE—A BIRD OF THE CAROLINA MOUNTAINS

The Golden Eagle is probably the most famous of all birds, certainly of all birds of prey, and it has been adopted as the emblem of many nations though it is the Bald Eagle that is the emblem of the United States. The Golden Eagle is the species always meant in folk-lore and literature when the term eagle alone is used. In the Middle Ages it was considered to be the "King of Birds." In North America it is found rather commonly in the Pacific States and in the southwest, but in the east it is mainly confined to the mountainous regions where it is found along the Alleghanies into western North Carolina, from whence it occasionally wanders eastward. Both Cooper and Oberholser state that it breeds in our North Carolina Mountains, but we have no definite record of any nest having been found. In mountainous regions it builds its nest of sticks on any suitable ledge on the face of a cliff. Its food consists of various small animals, mainly rodents and especially rabbits, though it will occasionally attack small lambs. It will also feed on carrion. This is the species meant in the stories of eagles attacking small children or carrying a baby to its nest, but although usually considered a stronger and fiercer bird than the Bald Eagle, recent experiments have shown it unable to carry anything as heavy as a small baby. The Golden Eagle is about the same size and build as the Bald Eagle, spread of wings about seven feet and weight about eight pounds. The adults of the latter can always be distinguished by their white heads and tails. Immature birds are not so easy to distinguish in the field, but in the hand the Golden Eagle is readily known by having the feet feathered down to the toes while the Bald Eagle has the lower part of the tarsus bare.
