

BUILDING AIRPLANES

The present state of airplane production in the United States reminds one of attempting to put out a fire with a garden hose.

We need planes by the thousands and yet we are producing them in hundreds. It was stated in the press that January aircraft production has surpassed expectations with the production of from nine hundred to a thousand planes including every type from the small fighters to a few sorely needed bombers.

With twenty-two working days in January this means approximately five and one-half planes per hour was the output of the entire military aircraft industry. Millions of dollars worth of aircraft have been contracted for with various aircraft manufacturers. The chances of these orders being filled in a reasonable time seem slim to those who understand the aircraft industry.

The production of military aircraft in the United States has been a custom business growing out of competition in aeronautical engineering. The army and navy have been independent of each other in their ideas of aircraft design. Each has felt that specific essentials were necessary to comply with the needs of the particular type of fighting that would be carried on by the craft. For the past several years the navy has concentrated on flying boats, particularly of the patrol type. While it is true this branch of service has produced other types of ships, the flying boat has received the dominant position. The army, as we all know, has concentrated on "flying fortresses." Recently the aircraft has been making headline news. Actually the history of military aircraft production in the United States shows a record of outstanding engineering achievement so far as design is concerned, but production has been on a custom basis. Aircraft has been handled in one of two ways: either the government engineers designed the craft and had one built to specifications, or the manufacturer submitted a design to the government engineers. After one plane was built the government tested it carefully. Those which indicated outstanding progress were considered worthy of further attention for combat purposes. Perhaps twenty or fifty such planes were ordered and added to our air power. As much as two years was often consumed by this process. Obviously new inventions and advances would render these craft obsolete before any quantity would be built. The result was a few of these and a few of those, but no great quantity of either.

That production tools and equipment for large quantities were not available was indicated by General Arnold, chief of the Air Corps, at 1941 appropriation hearings when he indicated that greater production was increasing the cost of aircraft rather than lowering the costs, as would be the case where the principles of production tooling could be applied.

An airplane is not difficult to manufacture accurately in large quantities. It is primarily a metal structure with a metal skin. The difficulties of manufacture are less than those of a properly built farm tractor. It would be possible for a properly equipped production plant to turn out one bomber per hour. The whole industry has been struggling to turn out one per day on a consistent schedule.

America once turned her plow shares into swords—now it's time to turn her automobiles into airplanes. The automotive production line methods must be turned loose on our aircraft production problem. It is the only sure means of securing the thousands of planes quickly needed to meet the needs of democracy at home and abroad. One plant could produce more bombers per day than our present or anticipated production of all types of aircraft.
