BIBLE THOUGHT FOR WEEK

THE SPIRIT SURVIVES THE BODY: For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.—1 Cor.

Complete Price Controls Coming

Almost everyone agrees that the United States is facing inflation. But even the experts cannot agree on how this situation can be remedied.

Our present price control policy is one of placing price ceilings on a selected group of commodities. Wages and farm prices are not controlled; they are expected to fall in line.

There are many Congressional leaders who do not believe that this policy is inclusive enough. They think it should go further. And, consequently, more stringent price control laws are pending in Congress.

Canada had until recently a price control policy similar to ours. Now, Canada has a ceiling over all agricultural and industrial commodities from original production to final consumption. Rents have been frozen and wages are geared to the cost of living.

There are two main differences between Canada and the United States that probably explain why the United States has not taken the much-needed steps to stop inflation. First, Canadian industry has been almost completely converted from civilian to military production, but this is not the case in the United States. We do not clamp down on the wages of workers in war industries because we need more workers in these industries.

In other words, wages must be attractive to draw workers into war industries until these industries are fully manned; then, wage control will not interfere with defense production.

The second difference between Canada and the United States, which also helps to explain why Canada can adopt price and wage ceilings, is the fact that Canada is at war. With friends and members of their family fighting in Africa and Europe, the people of Canada are more willing, than we are, to accept sacrifices.

But a complete price control program will come to the people of the United States. The question is when will it come. This depends largely on the willingness of various groups in the United States to accept sacrifices.

Milestones

When the armies of pre-Versailles Europe had been "at it" as long as armies have been fighting in this war, the First World War was half over. The Kaiser's forces had occupied an area five times that of the pre-1914 Reich, but Verdun had proved itself too strong for them, the British offensive on the Somme had greatly improved the Allies' position, the Russians had struck with great force in what nobody knew was to be their last big battle of the war. The more confident observers among the Allies thought they discerned the beginning of the end for the Hohenzollerns.

A comparison of the superficial aspects of the present war with those of the 1914-18 conflict at a similar point, indicates that Hitler's position is notably stronger than that of the Kaiser. The Nazi hordes have overrun much more territory and are strategically better situated in practically all the theaters except the Near East.

This comparison omits the American counterweight in the Battle of the Atlantic, of course, the smallness of the German Navy, and the effects of the blockade. In spite of the blockade the Nazis seem to have maintained terrific striking power in the field and a very fair morale on the home front. However, the effect of the 1914-18 British blockade against Imperial Germany, was hardly discernible at the half-way mark on the long, long trail to peace.

None of these comparisons are really fundamental. But they should serve to stimulate endeavor and to put iron in the determination of free men. Only the free can measure the awakening of peoples to the worldwide nature of the Nazi threat. Only these can plumb the depths of feeling
