Warning Issued On Hybrid Corn Seed

There is a tremendous difference in corn hybrids. A well adapted strain is an excellent investment, while an unadapted strain is an exceedingly poor investment and one that is almost sure to bring a loss when compared with standard varieties of corn.

Dr. Paul Harvey, in charge of the corn breeding work for the Agricultural Experiment Station at State College, points out that in their tests superior corn hybrids have averaged about 30 per cent better yields than standard varieties, while poorly adapted hybrids have averaged about 23 per cent less than the varieties generally grown on the farm.

"In addition to less grain, these poor hybrids had poorer quality grain, more rotten kernels, and more weevil damaged kernels," Dr. Harvey says.

He points out that some North Carolina growers are making the mistake of ordering corn hybrids from other states without first obtaining information as to yields and quality in this State. The fact that a hybrid gives excellent yields in Indiana is no guarantee that it will prove profitable in North Carolina.

In the northern part of the State, some growers who have been unable to obtain hybrid seed have gone over into Virginia to purchase seed. Recently one grower in the northeastern section of North Carolina spent $915 for corn hybrid seed of a strain that repeated tests in this State have shown to give much lower yields and poorer quality than can be obtained with standard varieties.

"Play safe with your 1945 corn crop and plant a good standard variety, if you cannot find seed of one of the good hybrids recommended for your area of the State," says Dr. Harvey.
