 Proper Use Farm Income Important Factor In Stable Economy

During World War I and in the period immediately following it, food prices soared to more than double by 1920, and inflated land values were accompanied by a great deal of speculative buying, says the Department of Agriculture and the Office of Economic Stabilization. This momentary farm boom was followed by a collapse. Between 1919 and 1921 the net income of the average farmer shrank from $1,360 to $460. This collapse brought with it a land crash which eventually saw one farmer out of every four lose his farm through foreclosure. Today farm income is at a record high—estimates placing the liquid assets held by farmers at about 12 billion dollars. There are three ways in which the farmer can help to prevent inflation and maintain prosperity for himself and all America: (1) He can avoid speculation in land, which means that he should consider the long-time earning capacity of farm land before he buys at today's inflated prices; (2) He can use his war-time income to build up reserves to replace worn-out machinery, to repair and improve buildings, to safeguard against crop failure and livestock losses, etc.; (3) He can keep his own prices stable. A further rise in farm commodity prices would lead to a general price rise, which would inevitably be passed back to the farmer in the form of higher living costs. The farmer's best hope for the future is to put every extra dollar into war bonds.

Army Needs Nurses

Major General Norman T. Kirk, Army Surgeon General, denies that our wounded men lack the "care they deserve" but he is careful to point out that it is only because heroic nurses and doctors work long hours to take care of the men.
 The General says that expectation of a nurses' draft has caused a decline in the number of nurses voluntarily enlisting. As of March 3rd the Army had 46,500 of the 60,000 nurses it wants by June 1st and he thinks that the urgency of the situation prevents waiting for passage of the measure.
 He calls for a vigorous prosecution of the voluntary nurse recruiting program. We doubt if there is anybody who cares to dispute the conclusions of the War Department, especially among those who have loved ones on the fighting fronts. Consequently, there must be some explanation of the amazing fact that American women have not volunteered in sufficient numbers to give the Army the nurses that it requires.

Peace And Pacific Bases

Fleet Admiral Ernest J. King's plea for retention of the newly won naval bases in the Pacific comes as no surprise. And it is entirely proper. For the American people should expect of their Navy that it urge every provision for the protection of vital American interests against any and all possible contingencies. That is the duty of the nation's top military strategists.
 Admiral King and his colleagues know through hard experience how difficult it is for a continental people whose home soil has not been entered by a foreign invader for five generations to grasp the meaning of strategic frontiers. The bitter lessons of World War Two have brought most Americans a long way in a short time toward a clearer understanding, but enlightenment is still needed.
 The process by which title to such bases is to be acquired involves issues by no means so clear-cut as the Navy's duty to urge the need. The world is entering an epoch of bright hopes but exceedingly delicate balances. The necessities of each nation to safeguard its own security cannot be permitted to stifle the young growth of world cooperation. Nor can a nation capable of self-defense cast its future safety without reserve into the lap of a world order as yet unborn.
 It would be most unrealistic to expect the United States at this early date to relinquish completely to some future international council the determination of the minimum essentials of its national defense. But it is highly practical and supremely important, in the light of all the world hopes for, that America approach this matter of bases with an honest willingness to travel, if need be, every avenue of international compromise and cooperation which is now open to traffic or which the United Nations at San Francisco may construct. — Christian Science Monitor.

U. S. Department of Agriculture reminds gardeners that one of the early season pests is the cutworm. For small gardens, paper about the size and stiffness of a penny postcard, pinned or tied into a cylinder, will provide good protection, if it extends an inch into the soil and about two inches above the surface.

With Perquimans Boys In Service

24 March 1945.
 Somewhere in France I have been receiving the Perquimans Weekly for many months, both in the ETO and here in France, and I cannot begin to tell you how much I enjoy to read about something that happened at home. To boys like me a day never passes that they don't think of that little old town back in America.

As for England, well after a few months here in France, you really get to appreciate both America and England. I guess today was my day, for I received seven papers, and boy, was I glad to get something to read, for no mail has reached me in so long that I was beginning to think I am lost myself.

Here's hoping I'll be seeing you before next year. Perhaps one great day before too long I'll be able to thank you in person. And I really hope that great day is not very far off. Thanks again for the paper. I enjoy it very much.

Sincerely yours,
 S-SGT. ROY BANKS.

Treat Peanut Seed To Increase Stand

The effectiveness of seed treatments in improving the emergence of peanuts has been surprising, say plant pathologists of the Agricultural Experiment Station at State College. In some cases, the percentage of emergence of treated seed has been more than twice that of untreated.

At the present, when government agencies are calling for stepped up production of this crop as essential to the war effort, the plant pathologists undertake to treat their seed before planting.

Preferred material for this treatment is Arasan at the rate of two to three ounces for each 100 pounds of seed. The cost of an application such as this runs about 16 to 24 cents.

As a second choice for this seed treatment, 2% Ceresan is recommended at the rate of three to four ounces for each 100 pounds of seed, and at a cost of 12 to 16 cents for the application.

Other materials that have also been found effective for the treatment, include Yellow Cuproside at the rate of four ounces for each 100 pounds of seed to be treated, and Spargan at the rate of four ounces per 100 pounds of seed.

 Any of these materials has been found to increase seed emergence and benefit plant stand, which are emphasized as two of the primary goals of every peanut producer in North Carolina.
