LOOKING AT WASHINGTON

retary of State James F. Byrnes.

The general opinion, however, is that the Government has abandoned the idea despite its support by the gentlemen named. Naturally, there are reasons why the United States Government takes this position. They involve the fact that a sovereign German government in Western Germany would not be under Allied control and there are strong reasons to think that it might fall under the influence of Soviet Russia.

It is pointed out that Western Germany, with its industrial plants, can offer the Russians a supply of manufactured goods of which there is a terrible scarcity in the Soviet Republic. In return, the Soviet can bargain with the Germans about restoration of the lost provinces of East Prussia, Pomerania and Silesia.

It is recognized that the Western powers, while taking no substantial territory from Germany as a result of the war, have nothing to be used in any trade with the Western German Government. In addition, the Western powers, being industrialized themselves, do not need the products of German industry.

The logical result of making a separate peace with Western Germany and setting up a state that would be somewhat free and independent, would be, in the opinion of many observers, to give the Germans and the Russians means to bargain to their mutual advantage. While the Germans in the area have little in common with Communism, the past record demonstrates that neither the Germans nor the Russians are averse to a deal if they see some advantage in it.

G. O. P. Somewhat Divided On Remedy For Inflation

It is too early to know what the Republican-controlled Congress will do with the anti-inflation program of President Truman. Senator Robert A. Taft, of Ohio, is on record against limited rationing and control of selected items of food, fuel and clothing. He has been joined by Speaker Joseph Martin, of Massachusetts, and other prominent Republicans.

The Party, however, contains individuals who do not agree with this attitude. Senators Ralph E. Fluender, of Vermont, and Raymond Baldwin, of Connecticut, both Republicans, believe that Congress should authorize the President to ration meat, if necessary, and take other steps to combat the inflationary threat.

We have no more liking for rationing than the next American, but we realize that when demand far exceeds supply, there will be a rationing, either through the process of higher prices or through governmental action. Under such circumstances we are in favor of proper legislative action to enable the Government, if possible, to ration scarce commodities and attempt to insure distribution upon a basis of equality between Americans.

At Home On The Farm With The City Cousin

The passing of Thanksgiving—with thoughts it brings to mind of fruitfulness and bounties of the land—reminds me of the Tar Heel farmer whose hybrid seed corn was so good he was forced into the sawmill business.

I didn't believe it either, being the skeptical sort that I am. But Jerry Bason, Alamance County farm agent for the Extension Service out at State College, says that's the way it was told to him.

The story we have gives us a picture of corn cribs bursting at the seams and a Country Cousin in the background who is trying to help undo some of the damage.

You see, he's J. T. Dixon, a pioneer hybrid corn breeder of Snow Camp, and a very conscientious fellow, too. He's assembling a saw mill to make lumber with which to build corn cribs for the farmers in his community who planted his hybrid seed corn this year, because, as he puts it: "The cribs just won't take care of the crop."

I've heard some folks over in this land of plenty have allowed that the old seed producer was just joking about the thing. Thought maybe he'd stir up a little interest in his profession. Sell a few extra seeds or something.

Well, all that may be true, but a recent check with the farm agent disclosed that one J. T. Dixon has assembled a saw mill.
