Too Much For Congress

The President's request for $8,500,000,000 in foreign aid in the next fiscal year comes at a time when members of Congress are suggesting that a congressional-executive commission be appointed to study the administration of foreign spending.

The idea is advanced that the members of Congress are unable to find out whether the money is being handled properly. Whether to meet this objection or not, sixteen members of key House committees are flying to Europe to hold an on-the-ground with General Dwight D. Eisenhower.

There may be differences of opinion in this country as to the advisability of spending $8,500,000,000 for foreign assistance but, regardless of the merits of the expenditure, most Americans will probably agree that the funds should be handled by the executive department, rather than by congressional committees which are peculiarly subject to the political pressure of various groups.

Gives Some Good Advice

When Secretary of Defense George C. Marshall addressed the graduating class of the United States Military Academy, he took note of the weaknesses that face a democracy in connection with military affairs.

General Marshall told the young officers that they would find it "exceedingly difficult at times to compose the democratic procedure of this country with the military pattern" which officers feel to be necessary for efficient and winning war-making.

Then, Secretary Marshall pointed out that "we're in a democracy" and urged the young men never to forget that they are officers in "an army of a democracy" and advised them that only a generous understanding of the fact could lead to a successful career.

Interestingly, General Marshall pointed out that now, after eight months of stripping other commands to replace Korean losses, the military manpower budget is beginning to balance. We have some 30,000 newly-trained soldiers available to replace veterans home. Back of them, of course, is the source of manpower provided by the draft and the proposed universal military training.

Some Price Control History

In connection with the arguments about price control, one should be reminded that on June 30th, 1946, price controls relaxed by statutory limitation. In the preceding four years, the Consumers' Price Index had risen about seventeen per cent.

The argument that the abolition of price controls would mean lower prices, because competition and increased production would make it inevitable, was answered in the next ten months when the price index shot up seventeen per cent, thus equaling the four-year rise before the abolition of price controls.

We call attention to these figures because of the demand, largely on the part of business men, that present controls should be wiped out and the further assertion that they are stifling production. This is the same argument that was advanced in 1946 and it is just as fallacious now as it was then.

Business leaders, like the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, insistently demand that the government give up all efforts to control wages and prices. Instead, an "indirect program" is advocated. This is the same theory that was advanced after World War II. It was successful at that time and Congress followed the advice of the business leaders.

Thereafter, prices advanced as much in less than a year than they had, under control, in the previous four years.
