On U. S. History

Mrs. Oscar A. Ahlgren, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, recently said in Washington that she had just one legislative objective for her two-year term. That objective is to make American history a required subject in high schools and colleges in states where there is no such law already.

Mrs. Ahlgren said she would have a model bill on the teaching of history drafted and hopes to get other organizations interested in crusading for such a law. She said the effort would be bipartisan and had the support of both the Republicans and Democrats.

The United States Office of Education reports that about three-fourths of the states already have laws requiring American history to be taught in public elementary and secondary schools but in about a fourth of the country's states American history is not a mandatory subject, even in grammar school.

Mrs. Ahlgren feels that it should be a required subject in high schools and colleges and that students at this age will be more likely to understand and appreciate it than younger students.

The new President of the General Federation of Women's Clubs has selected a sensible goal. In some states, where a large influx of immigrants is experienced annually and where American history is not a required subject, the residents, who often become citizens, actually learn and understand little of the great customs and traditions of the United States. Instead, they tend to remember and follow customs and traditions of other countries.

Mrs. Ahlgren will probably not succeed in getting all of the states to require the teaching of American history in high schools and colleges. She will perhaps succeed in only a few. In bringing this problem to the fore, however, she is doing a service to her country and is making an impression on public opinion which, in later years, might be translated into legislative action in various areas.

Sweden's Reward

The Swedish people got a taste of Russian gratitude recently when two Swedish Air Force planes were presumably shot down by the Russians over the Baltic Sea. The Swedes remained neutral in the last war and have attempted to remain neutral in the "cold war" between the democracies and the Communists.

They are now learning that the Communists treat all those who are not with them as against them, and that there is no middle ground in the worldwide struggle of ideologies. The Swedes, who have profited nicely out of both World Wars, without having engaged in either, are reported to be highly incensed by the Russian acts over the Baltic Sea. That they have not been just as highly incensed by Communist aggression, mass murder and brutality toward other peoples is not easily understood.

In viewing the Swedish scene, Americans should also remember that a United States plane was shot down over the same Baltic Sea, near the

some of the recent losses, in the spring of 1940. All three planes are presumed to have been shot down by the Russians, who are reportedly experimenting with atomic and other secret weapons in the area involved. Now, the Swedes are having to do just what the United States did in 1950—accept the outrage and loss of men and material with no other recourse open to them short of military operations. It is a case of taking the slap in the face or doing something about it, and the Swedes are not able to do anything about it. In 1950, the United States was not prepared, and the issue was probably not so important, as to demand U. S. military action. However, one of these days accumulated Russian acts of brutality will bring about retaliation the Russians will remember a long time. It may be five, ten or fifteen years, but eventually barbaric murders will be avenged.
