Stalks In Field Now Cost Money Later

Look at your tobacco fields and you will most likely see the stalks and suckers lying in some spots. These are not there in other spots, or even the whole field, because the stalks may be dying prematurely. This generally is an indication of nematode trouble, according to E. R. Bennett, State College Extension Tobacco Specialist.

In some seasons, the trouble might partially be due to early maturity in light, sandy spots, or the leaching of plant food in sandy areas, or too much water in poorly drained soils. This year most of the trouble can be attributed to the destruction of the plant roots by nematodes of one kind or another.

As soon as the tobacco is harvested, the tobacco plant roots should be turned out of the ground and exposed to the hot sun and drying winds, Bennett advises.

A large turning plow or "middle buster," using one furrow to the row, is a good tool with which to do the job. Growers who are just cutting the stalks or who are cutting their fields with a disc harrow, feeling that this is sufficient, are building a false sense of security the specialist asserts. The stubbles must be turned out, left to dry a few days, and then turned over with a drag harrow if good results are to be obtained. Discing the stalks down simply cuts the roots off and leaves them in the ground. Most growers will prefer to cut the stalks with a stalk cutter prior to turning the roots out of the ground with a turning plow or middle buster.

Stubbles should be turned out as soon as the last leaf is taken from the field, because at this time of the year nematodes are laying eggs and multiplying very rapidly. Leaving the stalks for several days may result in the further development of one or two generations of broods of the nematodes that are present.

Root Knot and other nematode diseases are one of North Carolina's most serious tobacco problems. Turning out the stubbles now is just one of the means of fighting this nematode problem and should be used to support the effectiveness of crop rotation. Destroying the stalks and suckers as early as possible will kill many horn worms and other insects. If the plant roots are turned out of the ground, and later harvested and dried, the soil is also in fair condition for seeding small grains.
