Comparison Shoppers Prove Prices Lower at Colonial
A report released today, comparing prices of food items at Colonial Stores with prices at other leading stores, shows Colonial generally lower than the competition.
The report was compiled by "comparison shoppers"—persons who actually shop in various food stores, then make a careful comparison of the prices.
The shoppers say shopping for groceries has made up other special study to determine the general make of a typical city family. Some of other quality and quantity are purchased in each store to be tested, then evaluated and compared under strict supervision to insure fairness.
A summary of the report showed that the total bill for an average week's shopping for a family of four was less at Colonial than at other leading stores checked.
New efficiency of operation plus expert food buying in colonial has made it clearly responsible for the savings being passed along to customers in the form of lower prices. Colonial officials pointed out in explanation.
The food chain, operating 224 modern stores in the southeastern area, uses the "comparison shoppers" method regularly to insure its customers the highest quality groceries, produce and meats at the lowest possible price.
Officials of the company cited the fact that Colonial Stores receives a profit of slightly more than one penny on each dollar in sales as another important reason for the chain's unusually low food prices.
