

News Report From Washington

The Formosa Dilemma—
Struggle Inside GOP—
Ike and Zhukov—
A Loyalty Question—

Washington — President Dwight Eisenhower is struggling with the Formosa crisis in two ways. First, he is having to be very careful to conduct the country's diplomatic relations so as to retain our allies, take advantage of all chances of a peaceful settlement of the Formosa dispute, and at the same time maintain the morale of Chinese Nationalist allies on Formosa.

Second, he is having to wage a bitter struggle within his own party in an attempt to keep his approach to the Formosa problem from being misrepresented. The President finds himself in the strange situation of having to defend his foreign policy more often against GOP attacks than against Democratic attacks.

Observers in Washington are beginning to wonder if such sharp divergences of opinion will not force the President to offer again for the job he now holds. His leading GOP critics in the field of foreign policy are Senator Knowland, of California, Senator Bridges, of New Hampshire, Senator McCarthy, of Wisconsin, and several other Senators, most of them from the Midwest.

The views of the gentlemen named above are so far from those of the President that Mr. Eisenhower would be genuinely concerned for the American people should this country's foreign policy be turned over to them, or to someone who did not have the popularity and strength of character to oppose them.

Mr. Eisenhower sees in their approach to the country's relations with other countries the approach of a big-stick and impatient giant to lesser powers. He is determined to conduct the country's diplomatic policies so as to reflect both a genuine desire for peace, patience and firmness. He is determined not to embark on a course which would lead to large-scale bloodshed unless it is absolutely necessary.

Unlike his critics, Mr. Eisenhower sees a difference between the aggressive methods of Communism and those of the dictators Hitler and Mussolini. He sees a difference between staying out of a war over small offshore islands near China, which we have never claimed, never formally agreed to protect, and which are actually highly unsuited for defense, and not going to war over the rape of Austria, or the sudden conquest of Czechoslovakia — which countries the allies in the thirties were pledged to protect.

Moreover, Mr. Eisenhower is a realist to the extent that he knows a Nationalist invasion of the Chinese mainland, without U. S. participation — large-scale participation — is unlikely to succeed. Intelligence reports give the Chinese Communists credit for having a control over China today as solid as was Chiang Kai-shek's control several years ago.

Mr. Eisenhower would have a hard time explaining to the American people next year (if he runs again) why this country was in an all-out war with 600 million Chinese, if we went to war over the Matsui or Quemoy islands, especially if that war were costing far more lives than did the Korean War.

Mr. Eisenhower would not have that trouble if he were fighting for Formosa, which we have formally announced we would protect. And he is ready to fight for either Formosa or the Pescadores.

One reason for the President's broad belief that peace prospects are improving is his relationship with Soviet Defense Chief Zhukov. Not only has news that Zhukov and Eisenhower have exchanged messages been noted with interest here and abroad, but the recent speech of Zhukov on May Day has also added hope in this field.

Mr. Eisenhower's efforts seemed to have been partly rewarded when Marshal Zhukov told the world in Moscow, on May Day, that the Soviet Union favored settlement of international disputes by peaceful means. And Russia was believed to be restraining China, to a degree, in an effort to prevent immediate war from developing out of the Formosa crisis.

The old loyalty question — which nearly wrecked unity at the 1952 Democratic convention, is bobbing up again. When former chairman of the party Steve Mitchell said recently he thought Democrats who supported President Eisenhower in 1952, as Democrats, he stirred anew a hornet's nest.

Such a condition would put many Southern Senators, some of whom supported the Republican nominee openly in 1952, squarely on the spot. The question is whether — if they were not accepted by the national convention as Democrats in good standing — they would support Ike again. Some wouldn't mind being for Ike gain, but others would like to support the Democratic nominee next year.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

ray began to show on his forehead. The priests thrust him from the Temple and from that day on, he was compelled to spend his life in solitary exile. Once the idol of his people, now Uzziah was shunned and despised by even the most lowly of his subjects.

While comparisons are often odious and moral-drawings sometimes tiresome, yet this lesson should not be overlooked today. Literally born in the blood of God-loving and God-fearing forefathers, the people of this country prospered so long as they remained loyal to and reverent of God. As they wandered away from Him, forsaking His temples, desecrating His day, there has come into the national life of this country unrest, discontent, strife and, if we do not mend our ways, national disaster.

Health Officer Offers Advice About Fly Breeding And Control Measures

The common house fly is considered one of man's most objectionable pests, but is also a dangerous menace to his health. "The house fly carries the germs of typhoid fever, diarrhea, dysentery and other intestinal diseases," says Dr. B. B. McGuire, district health officer.

The house fly is by nature very filthy. In some of the fly's bad habits, they are often found resting on human feces, sputum, manure, garbage, decaying animal flesh, and other forms of filth. Upon departure from these places they often visit your kitchen or dining room where they walk on your biscuits and pies, contaminate your milk and other food stuffs, and gather around the lips, eyes, and nursing bottles of babies.

Flies breed in manure, garbage, decaying fruit and vegetables. One fly lays her eggs in groups of from one hundred to one hundred fifty in such places; they usually hatch within eight to twenty hours into small, whitish maggots. After five to fourteen days these maggots change into seed-like, brownish shells. It is within this shell the maggot grows into the adult fly. The maggots will only develop in moist, warm, decaying organic matter.

There are three recommended ways to control house flies. First, destroy breeding places by cleaning up all filth. Since house flies need warm, moist, decaying matter in which to breed, the sanitary disposal of such material should be given considerable attention to reduce the fly population. All animal shelters, such as stables, cow sheds, pigpens and chicken houses should be cleaned as often as needed. Garbage should be kept in metal cans with tight fitting lids and hauled off every few days. All privy pits should be made fly tight and it is recommended that kerosene or lime be applied occasionally.

Second, screen all homes, restaurants, markets, abattoirs and other food handling places. Although effort is made to destroy fly-breeding places, it is very difficult to do a complete job. Flies would still come in from the outside. Due to this reason, it is necessary to have good screens on all places to be protected against them.

Third, use a good residual spray, one that is recommended for spot treatment inside dwellings, on porches, in out buildings and other locations protected from the weather. Spraying areas such as doors and windows, and on the walls and ceiling on the inside of the house can cut down the number of flies to zero, if the house is properly screened.
